Mati sprang to his feet, seized one of the knives, and waved his hand at the Princess in token of thanks. Gouigi stooped to pick up the other knife, but before he could resume the defensive, Mati bounded upon him with the ferocity of his namesake, the tiger, and only a quick movement on Gouigi's part saved him from death. As it was the blow but slashed his shoulder, and never heeding the dark blood that gushed forth he sprang at his treacherous enemy with a fierceness that matched his own.

For a time the blows fell fast, the spectators gazing with breathless interest at the unwonted sight. Forward and backward they pressed, and then Mati's great left arm shot round Gouigi's neck and drew him close to his breast, but just as his knife was raised to strike, the combatants whirled half round and fell full upon the ground.

For a few seconds they remained motionless, then slowly Gouigi released himself from the other's grasp and rose to his feet. But Mati lay prone upon his back, and protruding from his breast was the hilt of the hunter's knife.

Amidst the cries of approval that greeted the conqueror was heard the clapping of hands, and Gouigi, glancing towards Cheluilka, was rewarded with a bright smile and a nod of her stately head. But further along the line his eyes wandered, and there was little Natka, sitting back in her place and sobbing softly for joy.

The warrior's stern face relaxed, and for the first time that day he smiled grimly.

Then, although blood was dripping from the many wounds upon his body, he advanced to the chief, and folding his arms with savage grace, said, in a clear voice:

"I claim the right to choose my mate from these maidens. Who dares dispute me?"

There was no reply, and the old chief again arose and slowly addressed him.

"You have fought a great fight, and you have won. There is none living who dares dispute your right. Therefore, choose your mate from these maidens, and may your house be ever the abode of peace and plenty!"

In these words was the ceremony concluded, and now all eyes were turned upon the Princess Cheluilka. The daughter of the chief arose to her feet. The smile still lingered upon her features, but she held herself proudly erect as her dark eyes read the rebuke upon the faces confronting her.

"Mati was brave," she said, "but he is dead; and Gouigi was more brave, and is alive! Therefore, if I favoured the Tiger in the fight, it was to prove that Gouigi had the strongest arm and the greatest skill. Now you know why I gave Mati another chance. I have spoken."

She gave one proud look round her, and then her eyes sought those of Gouigi, and again she smiled.

No shout of approval greeted her speech as she resumed her seat. The people were silently watching Gouigi. He stood before the chief in the same attitude as before, but now a frown contracted his swarthy face, and his great eyes glittered strangely.

"Choose, oh, Gouigi!" commanded the chief.

Gouigi started and raised his head. Slowly his eyes passed down the line of maidens until they rested upon little Natka, and lifting his right hand he walked deliberately to where she sat and, drawing the astonished girl to his side, he exclaimed in a loud voice:

"I have the right to choose, and from all these maidens I take Natka to be my mate!"

Even that isolated tribe of savages could appreciate a heroism greater than mere prowess in battle, and the air resounded with wild cries of approval as the men and women of Macheki gathered round Gouigi to offer their congratulations.

But soon a hush fell upon the crowd, and with one accord they turned towards the scene of the late conflict, for the proud Cheluilka, unable to support the infamy of the slight Gouigi had put upon her, had rushed to the body of Mati, and drawing the knife from his breast, plunged it deep into her own heart.

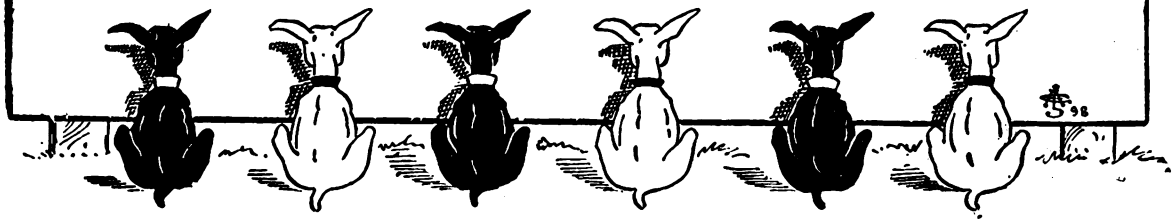
S. PERCIVAL.

CAN YOU MAKE ROCK CAKES?

SIX cash prizes of Five Shillings each are offered to the senders of the best rock cakes, made from any recipe. The competition is running in Home Notes, and closes on December the 29th. Anyone who can make these little cakes may compete, and only three need be sent. Full directions regarding competition will be found in Home Notes dated November 26th, now on sale.

Digitized by Google

THAT HORSE OF STIVER'S.



THE other morning at breakfast Mrs. Perkins observed that Mr. Stiver, in whose house we live, had been called away, and wanted to know if I would see to his horse during the day.

I knew that Mr. Stiver owned a horse, because I occasionally saw him drive out of the yard, and I saw the stable every day; but what kind of a horse I didn't know. I never went in the stable for two reasons—in the first place, I had no desire to, and secondly, I was not sure that the horse cared particularly for company.

I had never taken care of a horse in my life, and had I been of a less hopeful nature, the charge Mr. Stiver had left with me might have had a very depressing effect. But I told Mrs. Perkins I would do it.

"You know how to take care of a horse, don't you?" she said.

I gave her a reassuring wink. In fact I knew so little about it that I didn't think it safe to converse more fluently than by winks.

After breakfast I walked out towards the stable. There was nothing particular to do, as Stiver had given the horse his breakfast, and I found him eating it, so I looked about. He looked about too, and stared pretty hard at me. There was but little said on either side. I hunted up the location of the feed, and then sat down on a peck measure and fell to studying the beast. There is a wide difference in horses. Some of them will kick you over, and never look round to see what becomes of you. I don't like a disposition like that, and I wondered if Stiver's was one of them.

When I came home at noon I went straight to the stable. The animal was there all right. Stiver hadn't told me what to give him for dinner, and I had not given the subject any thought; but I went to the oat-box and filled the peck measure, and sallied up to the manger.

When he saw the oats he almost smiled. This pleased and amused him. As I emptied them into the trough, I left him to admire the way I parted my hair behind. I just got my head up in time to save the whole of it. He had his ears back, his mouth open, and looked as if he were on the point of committing murder. I went out and filled up the measure again, and climbed up the side of the stall and emptied it on the top of him.

He brought his head up so suddenly at this, that I immediately got down, letting go everything to do it. I struck on the sharp edge of a barrel, rolled over a couple of times, and then disappeared under a hay-cutter. The peck measure went down on the other side, and got mysteriously tangled up in that animal's heels, and he went to work at it, and then ensued the most dreadful noise I ever heard in my life, and I have been married eighteen years.

It did seem as if I never would get out from under that hay-cutter, and all the while I was struggling and wrenching myself and the cutter apart that awful beast was cutting round in that stall and making the most appalling sound imaginable.

When I got out I found Mrs. Perkins at the door. She had heard the row, and had sped out to the stable, her only thought being for me and three lumps of coal she had under her arm, and one of which she was about to fire at the beast.

This made me angry.

"Go away!" I shouted. "Do you want to knock my brains out?"

For I remembered seeing Mrs. Perkins sling a missile once before, and that I nearly lost an eye by the operation, although standing on the other side of the house.

She retired at once. At the same time the animal quieted down, but there was nothing left of that peck measure—not even the maker's name.

I followed Mrs. Perkins into the house and got her to do me up, and then I sat down in a chair and fell into a profound strain of meditation. After awhile I felt better, and went out to the stable again.

The horse was leaning against the stable stall with eyes half-closed, and appeared to be very much engrossed in thought.

"Step off to the left," I said, rubbing his back.

He didn't step. I got the pitchfork and punched him in the leg with the handle. He immediately raised up both legs at once, and that fork flew out of my hands and went rattling up against the timbers above, and came down again in an instant, the end of the handle rapping me with such force on the top of the head that I sat down on the floor. I went back to the house and applied some more liniment. But I couldn't keep away from that stable.

I went out there again.

The thought struck me that what the horse wanted was exercise.

Exercise would tone him down, and exercise him I should. I laughed to myself to think how I would trounce him round the yard. I didn't laugh again that afternoon. I got him unhitched, and then wondered how I was to get him out of the stall without carrying him out. I pushed, but he wouldn't budge. I stood looking at him in the face, thinking of something to say, when he suddenly solved the difficulty by veering about and plunging for the door. I followed, as a matter of course, because I had a tight hold on the rope, and hit about every partition stud worth speaking of on that side of the stable. Mrs. Perkins was at the window, and saw us come out of the door. She subsequently remarked that we came out skipping like two innocent children. The skipping was entirely unintentional on my part. I felt as if I stood on the verge of eternity. My legs may have skipped, but my mind was filled with awe.

Digitized by Google

I took that animal out to exercise him. He exercised me before I got through with it.

He went round a few times in a circle; then he stopped suddenly, spread out his forelegs, and looked at me.

Then he leant forward a little and hoisted both hind legs, and threw about two hods of mud over a full line of clothes Mrs. Perkins had just hung out.

That excellent lady had taken a position at the window and, whenever the evolutions of the awful beast permitted, I caught a glance at her features. She appeared to be very much interested in the proceedings, but the instant the mud flew she disappeared from the window, and a moment later she appeared on the steps with a long poker in her hand, and fire enough in her eye to heat it red hot.

Just then Stiver's horse stood up on his hind legs and tried to hug me with the others. This scared me. A horse never shows his strength to such advantage as when he is coming down on you like a frantic pile-driver.

I instantly dodged.

It frightened Mrs. Perkins dreadfully.

"Why don't you get rid of him?" she said.

"How can I?" said I in desperation.

"Why, there are a thousand ways," said she.

That is just like a woman.

But I could think of only two ways to dispose of the beast. I could either swallow him where he stood, and then sit down on him, or I could crawl inside of him and kick him to death.

But I was saved either of these experiments by his coming towards me so abruptly that I dropped the rope in terror, and then he turned about, and, kicking me full of mud, shot for the gate, ripping the clothes line in two, and went on down the street at a horrible gallop, with two of Mrs. Perkins's garments, which he hastily snatched from the line, floating over his neck in a very picturesque manner.

So I was afterwards told. I was too full of mud myself to see the way into the house. Stiver got his horse all right, and stays at home to take care of him. Mrs. Perkins has gone to her mother's to recuperate, and I am healing as fast as possible.

T. RUSSELL.

The Strange Story of a Box.

I WAS sitting by my library fire one evening, smoking, when my manservant informed me that a large box had arrived. I suddenly remembered that it was my birthday, and that I had casually mentioned the fact to my friend Brindle.

Now Brindle was much addicted to the playing of practical jokes (this to me was a flaw in an otherwise delightful character), and perhaps on this occasion I might be the victim, so I told the man to help me carry it into the library and then he might go.

The box which was a long and rather narrow one, was, I noticed, perforated in every direction. It was fastened with a padlock, in which I found the key.

I opened it and started back in amazement, for inside it lay one of the most beautiful women it has ever been my lot to see, and she was either asleep or dead.

She was dressed in a long trailing robe of violet velvet —what a woman would, I think, describe as a "tea-gown"; the train of it made a sort of cushion for her head and over it strayed long strands of golden hair.

I fetched a mirror and held it to her lips; a faint cloud spread over it at once.

She was not dead then, but sleeping.

Yet—who sent her here? And why in such a plight?

I had no women-folk to apply to in my dilemma; besides, one's women-folk are apt to look askance at "strangers" of their own sex, especially if these are very beautiful.

I decided hurriedly to take my man Burns into my confidence, a Scotchman (he always claimed descent from the poet) and very excellent servant, who had been with me for years. And he appeared with such celerity, that a suspicion crossed my mind—but no, surely he was above spying through key-holes!

I pointed to the girl and asked him helplessly what I had better do.

"Do, sir? Why send for the nearest doctor, and for a detective from Scotland Yard."

"Of course!" I cried. "Why didn't I think of that myself? Take a cab and do both errands—I will stay here in case she awakes."

He went off at once. He had hardly been gone ten minutes when the door-bell rang. I opened it myself and admitted a tall thin man, who announced that a policeman had asked him to call at my house, and that his name was Dr. Smith of M—— Street.

"A policeman—you mean my servant."

"No I don't, I mean a policeman," he said testily. "Where is the patient? I am a busy man, sir, and can't afford to waste time."

Rather bewildered, I led the way to the library—and in a few words told him my story and showed him the white figure lying so still and beautiful in those regal velvet robes.

He crossed the room to look closer.

"Good Heavens!" he said. "It is Mlle. Sophie Seslagin, a Russian lady and a patient of my own. What can this mean?" He proceeded to investigate what would be the cause of her strange trance-like sleep.

"She has been drugged," he said. "I once studied in Russia, and there they use a curiously smelling herb, for such purposes, difficult to detect unless one is used to dealing with it."

Digitized by Google

"All that is very interesting—to you," I said impatiently. "But what am I to do?"

"I will send you a nurse at once," he said. "Have you a spare room? Good. The nurse is a sensible woman, and will put the lady to bed and ask no questions except of a professional description.

"Now, you must excuse me, I am watching a very interesting case. I will call again in the morning; meanwhile I can do nothing. No drug known acts on a patient under the influence of the one I mentioned; she will wake naturally in about twelve hours time." And with that the doctor bustled away.

The next person to arrive was the detective (his name was Holmes), to whom I repeated my story.

He listened attentively, looked at Mlle. Seslagin, but made no remark worth relating, and presently went away, after giving me strict injunctions to allow no one access to my strange guest but the nurse and the doctor. I promised to attend to his warning and showed him out myself, to find on the door-step a comfortable, motherly-looking nurse, who produced Dr. Smith's card, and into whose capable hands I put the management of affairs generally with a sigh of relief, which sigh I repeated as the door of the "spare-room" was shut between me and the still sleeping stranger.

Only the long, coffin-like box was still in my study.

Suddenly I caught sight of a piece of paper which had been pinned to the lid inside.

On it was roughly sketched a ship, some waves, and a woman apparently drowning. What this could mean I could not guess.

I was still puzzling over it when the door-bell rang again.

This time a man stood there—he had evidently just stepped out of a close carriage which waited near the kerb, and he wore an ulster with a high collar which almost concealed his face.

"I have come," he said, "to retrieve a large box which was left here by mistake."

"Then you have come to the wrong man," I said boldly. "That box, and its contents, are in my care."

As I spoke, to my surprise two policemen sprang out of the shadow of a neighbouring archway, and seized the man before he had time to turn round.

"We were given a hint to keep an eye on this house, sir—by Mr. Holmes," one of them informed me shortly, before they marched off to the nearest "station" with their prisoner.

I retreated indoors and awaited developments. Evidently I was in for a night of it, I thought grimly.

And indeed, I had only taken half a dozen pulls at my pipe when a four-wheeler drove up. Inside were Mr. Holmes the detective, two policemen, and my servant Burns with handcuffs on.

"What does this mean?" I asked.

The detective came into the house and shut the door—the cab drove off—and I mechanically followed him into the library.

There, he turned and faced me.

"It means," he said, "shortly, this: that your man-servant is a member of a dangerous secret society of anarchists. Mlle. Seslagin (who is very rich) had bribed one of the younger members to sell her some papers which contained a clear and concise account of how to set about placing bombs in Westminster Abbey before the coming Royal Marriage—in order to blow up the whole Royal party.

"Once or twice, lately, Mlle. Seslagin's house has been broken into, not for purposes of theft, but to find the missing papers, which she had copied and sent to the police, but kept the originals to put the anarchists off the scent and help the authorities to catch them all together.

"Besides, she wanted to pretend she had not given information. She knew anarchists and their ways and feared their vengeance. She little knew their skill! They contrived this very evening to enter her house, drug her wine, and (while all her servants were at supper) they put her into this box which they had got ready and carried her off.

"The orders were to deliver the box at No. 1 Mortimer Street.

"By a curious coincidence, there happen to be two Mortimer Streets, and the box was brought to the wrong one.

"The plan was (had she been taken to the anarchist who lives in the other) to cross-examine her on the subject of these papers, and then she was to be taken out to sea and drowned. Dead men—and women—tell no tales."

I handed him the paper I had found.

"Yes—that is the formal order for her death. I know their cipher well."

"And—Burns?" I asked. "How was it, if he was 'in it,' that he offered—nay, went—to fetch the doctor and you?"

"He did neither. I sent a policeman for the doctor, and came of my own accord; Mlle. Seslagin's house has been watched for the last week, for (unless she was in danger of her life) I made up my mind to wait and catch the whole gang at No. 1 Mortimer Street to-night. The driver's mistake has put me out rather, in my calculations, for Burns had time to warn the others before I managed to 'nab' him. However, I hope for better luck another time. Meanwhile, you have indirectly saved that poor lady's life."

As he finished speaking I was busy writing; I handed him a cheque.

"Thank you, sir, though really I am so pleased at to-night's work I almost feel like refusing this."

"Nonsense, I may need you again. Good-night."

After that I was at last allowed to go to bed in peace.

I was a bachelor of long years' standing, and quite unaccustomed to such doings and goings on.

Still—though I can't say that the events of that night were exactly pleasant ones, I always, in after years, remembered it with something like gratitude, for that long, coffin-like box, which I thought held a practical joke, was the means of my making the acquaintance of the lady who afterwards became my wife.

CONSTANCE CRAIGIE HALKETT.

The Christmas Number of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, which costs sixpence, was published on November 17th. It contains complete stories by Beatrice Heron-Maxwell, George Griffith, Baroness Orczy, J. Le Breton, Basil Tozer, Mayne Lindsay, Alice Callander, Maud Coleborn, Ulysses Rogers, A. O. Tibbits.

The Number, which is inclosed in a coloured wrapper, includes three coloured plates.

Digitized by Google

DISENCHANTMENT.

When Don Luis became aware of his granddaughter's decision he was very much displeased, but yet it was, in the main, the surprise which irritated him. How was he to explain to himself this sudden wilful rupture which would put an end to a marriage arranged to the entire satisfaction of two families, and, above all, of the lovers themselves?

What had passed between them? What had actuated this step on the part of the young girl? Considering her intelligence, goodness and discretion, thought the poor old man, undoubtedly it was a grave and sufficient cause.

So the good gentleman, irritated by this turn of affairs, and spurred on by affection, determined to know the truth. Throwing aside the newspaper that he was holding in his hand, and confronting his daughter-in-law who had just given him the disagreeable news, he inquired:

"Is she in her room?"

"Yes, Señor; finishing her toilet, so that we may go out for a walk in the air. Heard you ever the like?" replied the mother with an expression of utter disgust.

"To walk—the same day that this scandal has occurred?"

"Just as you hear."

"Then I shall speak to her. Do you go first, tell her she may expect me, and leave us alone."

In a few moments and in a very bad humour, though without losing his outward calm, Don Luis entered the apartment of his granddaughter, where everything was extremely simple, but in which there was nothing great or small but revealed to the most casual observer the wealth of the family and the exquisite taste of the girl.

The walls were covered with a delicate tapestry, almost pure white, with tiny garlands of roses and buds running in slender lines from ceiling to floor, the furniture was upholstered with the same, and the carpet very light in tone. On the mantel stood a clock of antique porcelain between two tall, slim Venetian glasses, filled with white chrysanthemums.

The little accessories of the toilet table were of cut glass and ivory, bearing monogram and crest, and upon the table, beside a Sèvres vase and an elegant workbox, there were three photographs, two recent ones of the parents of the young girl, and one, yellowed with time, of Don Luis, in the uniform of lieutenant-general, his breast covered with crosses, and the medal of Africa.

The little señorita was seated on a low chair fastening the buckles of her shoes, when, observing the entrance of Don Luis, she instantly sprang to her feet, darted to his side, and putting her arms about him, exclaimed with the utmost tenderness:

"Little grandfather, dearest, why hast thou climbed up here? I was just going to thy room. When do I ever go out without first going to give thee a kiss?"

The two faces pressed close together in an affectionate embrace, were a marked contrast. The old man's still bore, amid its wrinkles the traces of an arrogant youth, and the beautiful girl of twenty summers, kissing him tenderly, appeared eager to impart to him something of her own abundant life and freshness. But presently, Don Luis recollecting what had brought him to his grandchild's room, disengaged himself with gentle firmness, and endeavouring to assume a tone of great severity, though with little success, said confusedly:

"But what is this? What has happened? Thinkest thou men are puppets that thou canst play with them? Dost thou know the scandal thou hast caused? Is it nothing that at this moment all Madrid is talking of us, and blaming thee, Heaven knows how!"

"Do not be vexed with me, little grandfather."

"But to appear so fickle! With the house nearly ready, the presents made—and to break it in this manner. What are people going to think?"

"Oh, I have cause!"

"What hast thou to complain of? Does it appear to thee that a young man of an age proportionate to thine, of good family, handsome, rich, and disposed to marry thee is a thing to be encountered every day? What has he done to thee? Who has broken, he or thou?"

"He has done nothing to me; and as for the breaking I have done it all."

"Foolish girl!"

"What wouldst thou, little grandfather? We may be intimate with persons for months, whole years, believing that we know them, and suddenly we find they have deceived us, and we knew them not at all. Better to learn the truth while there is yet time."

"But has he done anything ugly? Knowest thou anything dishonourable?"

"A little thing, which to me signifies much. Some people will say that I have made myself ridiculous. I am satisfied that I have done right. But, come here, come, and do not quarrel with me till you know all."

She said this between smiles and tears, but with much earnestness; then drew an armchair near the fire, where a couple of logs were crackling, made Don Luis accommodate himself therein, and one moment seating herself on his knees, the next pacing the floor, she spoke thus:

"Handsome, rich, of good family, all this is true; and moreover, I confess I loved him. And, nevertheless, I have broken with him for a little thing, for something which for many women would have no significance and represent nothing——"

"But what? Relate it!"

"You know already that we have been in love for more than a year and a half. It all began soon after papa bought this house. From the windows of this room I could see all the Calle del Obelisco as far as the entrance of the Castellana. I watched for Manolo every morning at ten o'clock, behind these windows, and almost always, with the punctuality of the true lover, he arrived in a few minutes on horseback. I would see him appear where the boulevard crosses the Castellana,

Digitized by Google

She sprang to her feet.

presently he would urge Lucero to a trot, and in a few minutes more he would be here."

"And what a handsome horse that is—a jewel!"

"Lucero would come with arched neck, his head drawn well in, and sensitive to the bridle, with froth dropping from his mouth, steps so airy that he seemed to spurn the ground from beneath his feet, and his tail erect and restless. It almost seemed that the intelligent animal knew he was coming to bring me an hour of happiness, and hastened in order to please me.

"In the twinkling of an eye he arrived at the iron grating.

"Unless it was raining, I went down to the garden, as at that hour no one ever passed this way, and there by the gate was a little time of chatting with Manolo; and I always gave to Lucero a biscuit or a couple of lumps of sugar. You cannot conceive how well he knew, how he would turn his head from side to side expectantly, until I stretched out my hand with the dainties through the iron bars of the gate.

"Of course, the principal occupation was talking with Manolo, hearing pleasant nonsense, pretty speeches, making plans for the future—you can imagine it all, little grandfather. With the horse I occupied myself but a moment; but, in truth, I loved him. I had a great tenderness for him; it was he who brought Manolo to me, and bore him as though upon wings. When I lay down to sleep I used to think of the hour of our meeting, wishing that the day might be fair, so that I could go down into the garden; when, at the window, my heart beat with expectation, my imagination pictured first of all to me the prancing of Lucero, his sudden appearance round the curve of the Castellana, his rapid trot clattering loudly on the hard ground, and then his waiting below, restive, with smoking flanks, and pawing the ground, down there by the rose bushes and hedges of the garden, which was where I would stand——"

"But why do you recall all this?"

"Was I truly in love with Manolo? With my hand upon my heart—so I believe. Above all, even more than handsome, well bred, loving and very chivalrous, to me he seemed good, above reproach, a man of fine feelings."

"And then?"

"I have nearly finished. Ten or twelve days ago, one morning Manolo came on a different horse. Naturally, the change surprised me.

"'And Lucero?' I asked him.

"'He is sick.'

"'What ails him.'

"'I do not know; some trouble in one of his feet.'

"'Poor horse!'

"'Oh, we will cure it yet.'

"We spoke no more of it. In the days following I inquired for the horse, and it struck me that he evaded a reply. Finally last week his servant unfortunately came to bring me a letter, and, as he knew that I always bestowed upon him some little present, he asked to see me. The horse coming to my thoughts I asked him:

"'How is Lucero?'

"The boy assumed a very singular expression between sadness and stupidity, and answered:

"'He will never eat again, I am thinking.'

"'Is he dead?'

"'Yes, senorita. Ah, if it had been no worse than to die—poor beast!' said he.

"'Then what has happened?'

"Upon this the servant, like one who fears having spoken too much, remained obstinately silent, I had to draw the words from him by force of cunning. Until I had promised to say nothing on the subject to Manolo, he was unwilling to relate what had happened. To be brief: He told me that the horse had sustained some injury to the hoof, the nature of which I do not know, save that it was swollen and very sore. And here comes what is horrible and cruel. The veterinaries said to Manolo that for this there was no remedy, that the horse would remain very lame, if not perfectly useless, and Manolo, instead of allowing him to die in his stable, even though it cost him something—and how fortunate he should have counted himself that he could so easily bear the expense!—instead even of granting him the mercy of a bullet, sold him, sold him to the Plaza de Toros! And thou knowest——"

"What brutality!" exclaimed Don Luis, unable to restrain himself.

"And what is worse, that was on Friday, then on Sunday I was present at the Corrida, and I saw the poor Lucero die in the arena, as they die there—I can say no more, little grandfather!"

At this point the young girl dried a tear which flowed perhaps both in pity for the dead horse and bitterness for her shattered ideal, and continued, saying:

"It is a pleasure for me to go sometimes to los toros, for the excitement and the crowd, and to attire myself in the mantilla, but what Manolo has done is unspeakable. It was the horse which brought him to me, which I watched for, and which I loved because he came flying! I have often heard thee tell of thy great sorrow when thy horse was shot from under thee at the battle of San Pedro Abanto, and so," concluded the girl with extraordinary energy, "it seems impossible to me that this man can be good, and marry him I never will!"

K. Dombey.

Digitized by Google

THE LOOKING-GLASS.

THE evening of the 11th Pluviose, year II. of the Republic (February 1st, 1794), Mademoiselle Nanine de Leigrealles, who, at this period of the Terror was called simply "Citoyenne Leigrealles," retired early to her sleeping chamber. In these troubled times she lived alone with an old nurse in a country house inherited from her mother and situated at Eillons, near the village of Ecouviers, a short league from the Belgian frontier.

After passing a large part of her childhood and youth in this retired region, she had again taken refuge there on the occasion of the sequestration of the patrimonial hotel where she was residing in Verdun with her father, the Marquis de Leigrealles, whose property was confiscated as that of an "emigre" when the Marquis went to join the army of Conde. Eillons and Ecouviers not being agitated by the revolutionary fever, Mdlle. de Leigrealles, loved and respected by all the peasants in the neighbourhood, found herself there in almost absolute safety.

This evening, all through the supper, her old nurse, Bastienne, had told her exciting stories in relation to visions and revelations on Candlemas night. She had even assured her young mistress that by placing a mirror under the bolster and pronouncing certain words, one could see that night "during one's sleep" the man whom one was to love and afterwards marry. Nanine, who was slightly superstitious, longed to test the truth of this legend. It was for this reason she went to her room immediately after supper.

Once alone and half undressed, she took a looking glass in her hand, and before hiding it under the pillow, looked complacently at what it showed her.

Mdlle. de Leigrealles was entering upon her twenty-fourth year, and her beauty had attained its full development. Tall, slender, stately, fait au tour, as they said in those days, she had pretty, curling, black hair, large brown eyes, a white skin, and a little mouth, with tiny dimples in the cheek when it smiled. Her blood was hot, an inheritance from a long line of gay and gallant ancestors, and her heart was very tender. Although the Terror was at its height, people thought none the less of love and its secrets, and this adorable girl, while living discreetly, inwardly lamented her loneliness, and grieved to have no lovers. But what could be done? Chances became more and more rare. the young men of quality who might have loved her had all emigrated, and she was too proud to marry a boor.

Stifling a sight of regret, half amused and half credulous, she decided to repeat the sacramental words which Bastienne had taught her.

"Mirror, make me see while sleeping
Him who is to be my lover!"

Then she slipped the mirror under the bolster, went to bed, and soon fell asleep.

Well, almost immediately the charm took effect. In the midst of her first sleep she saw in her dream a long perspective of mirrors, in which there moved as in a fog a multitude of eccentric heads. Gradually the fog lightened, the figures defined themselves, then blended into a single apparition—very distant, in the recesses of a church chancel. The apparition slowly approached, and then Nanine distinguished an old man with hoary head and wrinkled cheeks, in French costume, who advanced towards her, and held out his hand to her. The idea that she was destined to marry this old nobleman, at least sixty, so shocked her that she awakened suddenly. She had great difficulty in going to sleep again, and rose the next morning still agitated by her dream.

As she completed her toilette, Bastienne entered her room and said, in handing her a letter:

"Mademoiselle, a gentleman has just arrived, who asked me to deliver this note to you, and wishes to speak with you."

Nanine glanced at the superscription of the note, which she hurriedly unsealed as she recognised the handwriting of her father, the Marquis de Leigrealles, as follows:—

"My dear Nanine,—This note will be transmitted to you by one of our countrymen, Count Frehaut, who has been charged by the Prince de Conde with a confidential mission in Lorraine. Receive the Count with all hospitality, and conceal him until he shall find means to arrive at his destination. He will inform you of our affairs and give you intelligence of your father, who embraces you tenderly.

FRANCOIS DE LEIGREALLES.

Luxembourg, January 30."

With a beating heart Nanine hastened to descend to the drawing-room, where the traveller had been received. She saw a gentleman who appeared to have passed his fiftieth year, muffled in a brown great coat, and vaguely resembling the old man of her dream. Notwithstanding his apparent age, his drawn features, his creased eyelids, the Count had a lively eye, and his fine brown eyebrows contrasted with the grey hair which he wore very long, and tied at the back of his neck with a black ribbon.

Digitized by Google

After ceremonious greetings and brief tidings respecting the situation and health of the Marquis de Leigrealles, M. de Frèhaut admitted to his hostess that he was broken down with fatigue, having made the last part of his journey at night, on foot, and asked permission to take the rest of which he was in great need. Nanine gave orders that a room should be prepared for him. He retired to it as soon as it was ready, and did not appear again during the day. But towards evening, Mlle. de Leigrealles having inquired after him, he notified the young girl that he was completely restored, and that he would come down to supper.

He presented himself accordingly at about seven o'clock, freshly shaven, and simply dressed in a coat of coarse brown cloth, with two rows of buttons, in grey, tight-fitting breeches and scalloped half-boots. Despite his wrinkles, his grey hair, and bent shoulders, he had a very pleasing air, distinguished manners, exquisite courtesy, and extraordinary vivacity for his age. They went into the dining-room, and sat down together at a table before a good fire of blazing wood. The menu, superintended by Mdlle. de Leigrealles, was substantial and delicate; the wines were of the choicest quality.

M. de Frèhaut did honour to the repast, and showed himself a charming guest, and brilliant talker. He had sprightliness and imagination, and related with much humour his adventures as an "emigre." Was it the effect of the pretty, sparkling wines to which she was not accustomed, or perhaps of her youth and her protracted solitude that inclined her to susceptibility? When the dessert came, Nanine de Leigrealles had begun to find her guest very fascinating for a man who was approaching his sixties.

They took coffee in the parlour, and, as the harpsichord stood open, M. de Frèhaut inquired of Nanine if she were musical. Upon her affirmative reply, he admitted that he had been in his day quite a pleasing vocalist. Nanine proposed to accompany him, and, without waiting to be urged, he sang her an air from Orphee, "I have lost my Eurydice." His voice, uncommonly fresh and young, confirmed the impression already made upon Mlle. Leigrealles. Music, we all know, acts marvellously upon the senses and the heart. When they quitted the harpsichord, the conversation had taken quite naturally a more sentimental, a more intimate turn. While maintaining the reserve imposed upon him by his age, M. de Frèhaut had become eager, almost admiring; his conversation hovered discreetly over the theme of love; his blue eyes had an expression which became more and more insinuating, more and more penetrating. When he retired at eleven o'clock, he lingeringly kissed the hands of his hostess, and left Nanine much moved, and quite ashamed of the emotion produced in her by this tête-à-tête with a man more than double her age.

She passed a restless night, recalling with too much pleasure the trifling incidents of the evening, letting her fancy wander in singular dreams, then blushing at her own folly.

Her awakening was equally agitating, but in a very different fashion. Towards noon the Mayor of Ecouviers arrived at Eillons by a private road, and warned Nanine that she was suspected of entertaining an emissary of Pitt and Coburg. Some bad fellows had seen M. de Fréhaut enter her house, and had hurried to denounce her to the Revolutionary Committee of Montmedy. A domiciliary visit was impending; he came to warn her as a friend.

"What can be done?" exclaimed the terrified girl.

"You must rid yourself at the earliest possible moment of this dangerous visitor," replied the worthy man. "At the foot of your park there is a pavilion hidden by the trees. Hide this gentleman there until night. When it grows dark my son will come for him, and will conduct him through the woods to the frontier. As soon as your man hears the owlet's cry, he has only to step over the window-ledge of the pavilion, and he will find my boy at the foot of the wall."

This was indeed the only means of safety. Nanine, trembling with fear, went to apprise M. de Fréhaut of the peril that menaced him. She made him breakfast hastily in his room, and herself conducted him to the pavilion, where she remained with him, shuddering at the faintest noise, her ear on the alert, and at each movement fearing some surprise. He, on the contrary, habituated to similar alarms, showed himself very philosophical, and regretted but one thing—to so suddenly leave his charming hostess. Seeing her great terror, he endeavoured to reassure her by his affectionate manners, at first paternal, but gradually more and more tender.

The hours of the afternoon wore thus away, with alternations of anxiety and of melancholy interest. Despite her fears, Nanine was surprised and grieved to note the rapid passage of the hours.

At Candlemas, night comes early. Towards five o'clock the little octagonal room of the pavilion grew dark.

"Alas!" sighed M. de Fréhaut, "the moment of our separation approaches."

He took Nanine's hands.

"Before going away, permit me, Mdlle. de Leigrealles, to thank you for your kind reception, and to assure you that I will preserve an unbroken recollection of it."

While speaking he drew her to him, kissed her brow and then her eyes.

Nanine, bewildered, her heart contracting, felt herself dominated by a sudden impulse. Her head swam; but it was a sweet faintness, a delicious bewilderment. Suddenly she laid her lips upon the cheek of M. de Frehaut, who, trembling and with quite youthful fervour, responded by passionate caresses. For a moment they forgot everything in this transport of love. Then the owlet's cry, resounding from the end of the road, recalled them to the present.

"It is the signal," stammered Nanine; "adieu!"

He wished to enfold her again, but she withdrew herself firmly.

"Go!" she entreated.

De Fréhaut stepped lightly over the window-ledge and disappeared down the gloomy path.

Recovering herself, and deeply agitated, greatly confused because of her weakness, Mlle. de Leigrealles returned to her house. It was time. Officers armed with search warrants were arriving. They got nothing for their pains, showed themselves, on the whole, sufficiently obliging, and went away after drinking large bumpers to the health of the "Citoyenne."

Nanine shut herself up in her room in order to avoid the eyes of old Bastienne. It seemed to her that anyone could read in her face her remorse—and also her regrets. Even while dreaming of the fugitive she blamed herself for the unpardonable weakness which had thrown her into the arms of a man almost as old as her father.

Digitized by Google

The following day the Mayor came to reassure her as to the fate of M. de Fréhaut.

"He crossed the frontier," he told her, "without being disturbed, and my boy conducted him as far as Verton."

"He must have been faint with fatigue," sighed Mlle. de Leigrealles. "Think of it—so long a stretch on foot—at his age."

"At his age!" repeated the peasant with a burst of laughter. "Ah, he is not over thirty! He was smeared and powdered so as not to be recognised. But once in Belgium he threw away his wig, and our Claude found himself confronted by a handsome young fellow!"

"Ah!" murmured Nanine, growing dreamy and agitated again. At the same time, her eyes moistened, and she mused over the brief moments of their love which perhaps would never return.

When the Count de Fréhaut returned in 1815 with Louis XVIII., he was really ripe and grey. The King, in recompense for his services, created him Inspector of Forests in the Mersin region. M. de Fréhaut inquired for Mlle. de Leigrealles. She had remained unmarried and continued to live at Eillons. He called to see her, found her still attractive, notwithstanding her forty-five years, and the following year they were married.

It was thus that her vision of Candlemas night came true for Nanine.

B. COLLINS.

AN UNSUSPECTED HERO.

THE doleful sound of the old bell had been our childish terror. The autumn wind or winter's blast sent out its measured sounds, and above the noise of the summer storm we could hear its regular notes.

We lived nearer to the Old Red House than anyone in the parish, but others heard its melancholy tones, and were secretly afraid.

It had been ringing that way for ten years or more. The bell was the first in that neighbourhood, and had been hung in the forks of a young maple by the dead master of the Red House. Rust covered its sides, and the tongue, said men who had looked to see, was half gone, but tongueless as it was, the wind, swaying the tree, still sent forth those weird, tolling sounds.

Decay was king at the Red House now. A solitary green blind hung at an upper storey window and creaked in the wind, adding its sharp notes to those of the bell. Gnarled old apple trees grew in the front by the roadside, and the tall lilac bushes obscured the windows, close by the settling porch. The paint was off in great patches, and rags filled the place of many broken panes in the windows.

To the left the ground sloped into a deep ravine. The raspberry and blackberry bushes near the gulch had grown into a wild and tangled mass. Other shrubs and bushes had come up and made a copse of impenetrable density. Here, almost entirely hidden by the growth, three tombstones, yellow and mossy, marked neglected graves. It was within the deep and unbroken shadows of this copse our childish fancy pictured the home of the Ghosts and Goblins who rang the bell and made fiendish merriment when the wind was high.

The legends said it was the oldest house in the neighbourhood. Its paint was bright and new when my father was a boy, and its master was the "aristocrat" of the country round. I think he must have been a gentleman in every sense of the word, reserved and never understood by his neighbours. Most of them had lived to see him die and the bats and birds take up their abode in the great cornice, the tall grass to grow each year, and die uncut.

Other farms were neat, or if not, showed signs of some progress. You could almost see that young life was about them, the grass was so trodden down, and the places where children play were everywhere apparent. The Red House might have been the home of a tottering, feeble old man, with no hands but his to do the work.

The builder of the Red House had died five years before, but the place was still peopled. No one called on its inmates but a lawyer, the guardian of the son, Joseph Shepard.

Physically, the youth was as his dead father had been. He had broad shoulders, was tall, and his muscles were of iron. A light brown beard grew upon his face, for he had never been shaved. His vacant, staring eyes, half-open mouth, and shuffling, undecisive walk told the story. The massive head was empty. Quiet and harmless, he played boyish games with us at the door of the country school and at our homes. But he never let us go beyond the gate at the Red House. Everyone was confronted with the same remark:

Digitized by Google

"You cannot come in." And young and old knew, as they looked at him, that it would not do to disobey.

I know we all felt sorry for Joe, and never fully understood why he should be simple. Sometimes he would be morose and sullen, and stay within the damp and musty walls for days. His three sisters lived there with him.

Two of them we had seen, but the other was never seen out of doors in daytime. Once, at night, when, in a storm, my father and I were hurrying home, the bell began to toll and fearful cries and shrieks came from the House.

My father stopped his horse and listened. He thought it might be the solitary, creaking blind. The cries continued, lower, and more like a wail of pain than before. I crept close to his side, and I know he shuddered involuntarily.

A flash of lightning illuminated the scene, and the Red House stood out in all its decay. Near the great lilac bush, her hands extended, was the ghostly form of a woman. We were close to the fence, and I could see the look upon her face.

"Annie!" whispered my father.

All was darkness again. A sound of a heavy voice, which I knew was Joe's, a shriek which sent the blood freezing in my veins, and then another flash.

The figure in white had disappeared, and my father drove on.

"There is a bane upon the household," said our neighbour, Mr. Talbott, the next day. "First, the mother dies, and a sweet, pretty woman she was, too; mourning for a son who was, and was not. I didn't know much about him, but leastways I know he broke his mother's heart, not coming to see her or letting her know where he was. I knew them intimately. They said as how he went away and died."

"That was what somebody said," replied my father.

"But he didn't. Oh! I know, he had it, too, and it's a duty of mine, seeing you are a guardian of the parish, to impart this in my humble way. He died in an asy um."

"Insane?" was the astonished question.

"Mad. He knowed it was coming on. It's hereditry. Father had 'em, grandfather had 'em, and children's gettin' hereditry, too. So Shepard knowed it was a-coming. He felt it in his head, and arranged things for the children. He hung on so long as he could, and then he went in an asylum."

"Horrible!"

"It's nothing to what follows. I have been doing business for the guardian for many years. I know how things is. Annie's got hereditry now, and last night shows how bad."

"Why, she's been more or less so for years," said my father.

"But it isn't a bad sort, and Joe——"

My father groaned.

"And Joe"—Mr. Talbott rose. His ruddy face had turned white with excitement—"is gettin' bad, very bad, and when he goes out I tremble for the lives of the children of this neighbourhood."

My father forbade us playing with Joe from that moment. It was only two weeks later that the wide road was filled with clouds of dust made by a long funeral procession following behind a plain hearse which bore the remains of Annie Shepard.

We went over the fields to school that winter to keep from possibly encountering Joe. We never mentioned his name above a whisper. It seemed cruel to us sometimes to be deprived of his assistance in all our childish amusements. But we had an inward fear of him, and hid many times behind fences when he appeared in sight.

One cold winter's morning when we arrived we found the bigger boys and girls all talking in great excitement.

Joe had done something awful. He had nearly killed Mr. Talbott, and fled, no one knew where. The teacher, a gentle, timid little woman, kept the door locked all day.

Once little Jimmie Parker screamed out in fright.

"It's Joe!" he gasped, pointing to a window.

But no one else saw him. The woods came up so close, and there were no windows in the back wall.

When three o'clock came, the teacher said she would not hear the spelling, and dismissed us at once. No one went our way. We lived in the last house on that side of the village. So half-frightened, but telling everybody we were not afraid, we started across the field towards home.

We did not loiter, but wound in and out among the fallen logs, covered with little roofs of snow, and the brush-heaps, casting furtive glances behind every pile, and trembling at every noise. My sister Gertie was ahead. It was only fifty yards now to run, her inward fear accelerating her speed at every step.

As she came to the open space, a dark object leapt forward and struck her to the ground. I stopped, too frightened to move.

"Joe!" I had said under my breath.

But it was not Joe. It was Mr. Joslin's great brown bull, which had always been tied in the stable. Now its red eyes gleamed fire through shaggy brows, as it leapt over the prostrate body of Gertie, but whirled and turned to trample her. She had risen to her feet, and with more presence of mind than I displayed, started to run.

But the brute was close to her.

Then I saw a great shuffling figure rush between them.

It was Joe.

I danced with delight.

"Run for the fence, Gertie!" I shouted.

I never knew just how it happened, but with those mighty arms of his, his head uncovered, and his long flaxen hair flying in the wind, Joe was fighting a terrible battle with the bull. I ran to the fence, and my sister and I stood fixed to the spot watching the combat.

* * * * * *

They let us look upon his face as he laid there in the front room of my father's house that night, I remember it so plainly. There was a smile of defiance on the dead face, the eyes, which had been so vacant, were closed, the high forehead might have been that of a Shakespeare.

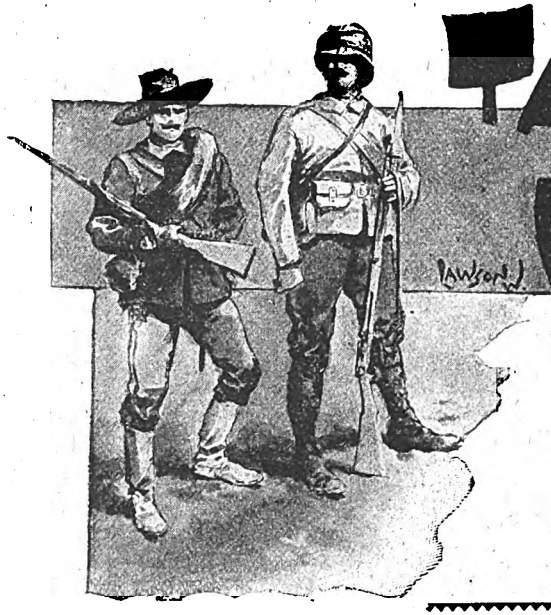
My father shed tears as he said then:

"You can't always tell where you will find a hero."

And I believe it.

MERVYN CARTWRIGHT.

Digitized by Google



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Across America in Sixty Hours.

A change indeed had swept over popular sentiment in America.

All those little outbursts of irritation, those fretful taunts at the Mother Country, those frail manifestations of national hatred, of which so much had been made in the past, showed themselves to be superficial and unreal. In part, these were evoked by the calm assumption of superiority by Englishmen who travelled in the dominions of America; in part, too, the stern mastership of England, strong in her centuries of honourable growth, and resting on foundations set long back upon the elements of national character, was galling to a young, unsettled country. And, in lesser degree, these excitations were but the signs of increasing strength—the "growing pains" of a great nation.

But deep below such fitful and transient moods there remained in the heart of the United States a strong and abiding love for the Old Country. No one who knew America doubted her constancy.

Wayward, impulsive, she might deceive herself in days of calm and prosperity. But it needed only the presence of danger, the loud imperious call of kinship, for her to cast off her indifference and reveal herself as she is, the western branch of the great Saxon race, the other England, one with Britain in blood, in history, in language, in feeling, in character, in destiny.

This was what had occurred.

As from day to day came news of repeated dangers threatening England, American opinion became restive. The Jingo party in the Senate mourned to find their speeches no longer applauded; Presidential messages failed to charm. Horror of horrors, even the great name of Monroe, though interjected skilfully where enthusiasm was most wanted, fell cold and dead upon an ungrateful people.

"Jehosh!" exclaimed one patriot, "it's mortal slow at Washington with nothing but Monroe, Monroe, Monroe, morning, noon, and night. If these blamed pulpit-slappers imagine that the whole American nation is going to exist for ever on Monroe, they'll find themselves darned well mistaken. It's about time for a change of menoo!"

And they soon had a change of "menoo."

The growing excitement in the country, finding an outlet in demonstration and public meetings, gradually spread to the great American journals, and began to sway the opinions of Congress. And when it was whispered that Russia had joined the allies, and would attack the defenceless shores of the great home of the Saxon race, there swept through the States a convulsive shock which rocked the very throne of Government, and threatened to tumble down President, Cabinet, and party, in disastrous and utter collapse.

The Democrats sought for a brief moment to stay the storm and pacify the tumult of public opinion.

At a meeting of Congress, the Government spokesman hurled forth anew the mystic name of Monroe, and bade his fellows remember their duty to the doctrine of neutrality on which American polity was based.

It was at this point that Jeremiah P. Sloker, of Wilmington, Pa., achieved undying fame.

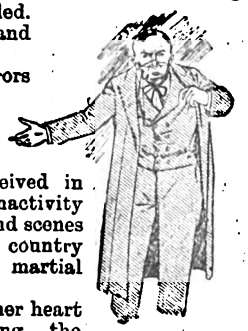
Springing to his feet, he rushed into a wild and turbulent speech, passionate with sympathetic feeling for England, and then in a vehement peroration he declared:

"Mr. Speaker, we have heard too much of the Monroe doctrine (Loud cheers). Are we such hoodoos that we have only one string to play on, and like a superannuated fiddler ding away at it till everyone's distracted? Who was Monroe? An excellent gentleman who made a very sound remark. We appreciated his remark, and we treasured it up. But I guess he's dead. It's high time to dandle a fresh baby in the face of Europe. It is quite as easy to make a new doctrine which will have just as much authority. I, sir, am, I trust, an excellent gentleman. And I will make a very sound remark (laughter and cheers). And you may call it, if you like, the Jeremiah P. Sloker Doctrine. And this is what my doctrine is. It is our duty, sir, to remember the claims of kindred, to succour our brethren, to assist those hard pressed in unjust war, to fight for truth and liberty. We must side with those of our blood who call upon us for our help and ask us to renounce our selfish, indolent, and impious inactivity. (Loud cheers.)

"There, gentlemen," continued the orator, turning round suddenly to the house, "that is the Jeremiah P. Sloker Doctrine, and I'll back it against Monroe's as I would a lively infant against a mummy." (Loud cheers.)

Digitized by Google

The extraordinary speech acted like a spark on gunpowder. The whole House, save for a small knot of Ministerialists, was enthusiastic. The real inward feeling of the American nation prevailed. Two days later President Cleveland was constrained to declare war.



He rushed into a wild and turbulent speech.

In that one act all his former errors were forgiven and forgotten. No Minister had ever had the opportunity of doing so popular a deed. The silence and indifference with which he was received in Washington during his weeks of inactivity changed to enthusiastic ovation and scenes of wild excitement. The whole country was inflamed with the fire of martial ardour.

For it was what America in her heart yearned for. To stand among the nations, no longer youthful, immature, undeveloped; no longer to be patronised as a land of promise; no longer the excitable irresponsible country which older civilisations indulged with a smile; but as a strong man, equal in power, in wealth, in wisdom to the oldest great peoples of the earth—this was what she had so ardently desired.

And now she had stepped forth, free from boyhood's privileges, a giant into the arena, and was standing side by side with England—the ally and defender of the greatest country that the world had known.

At last would commence her real national history—the history of a people made one by suffering and by activity. For she could not look back upon her first melancholy war with England, still less on the ghastly struggle amongst her own sons, and regard these as the prouder epochs of her life. Civil war cannot make a people great. America longed for some such splendid struggle as this that was now before her, a struggle against all Europe, as the starting point of a new and glorious period in her history, as something which would give her character and solidity, and establish her place firmly amongst the nations.

Excitement grew keener still when the newspapers published a telegram of quite extraordinary novelty. Had such a message ever passed between two nations before? Thus it read:

Queen Victoria desires through President McKinley to thank the American people for their generous action. The cause of both nations must for ever be the same—to give to the whole earth freedom and abiding peace.

From north to south, from east to west, the great centres of population throbbed with high resolve.

Throughout the marvellous changes of climate and soil and sky and country which make the vast continent so mysterious, there was the same eager animation, the same desire to swell the ranks of the newly-created army.

States hoary with civilisation, and States yet rugged with crude primitive life, vied with each other to send forth battalions.

Had the Americans had their own way, a volunteer army of five millions would have been raised in a week.

"Everyone's helping," observed Hiram K. Thatcher, "and it's deuced funny. Who ever saw our chief cities all singing the same tune before?"

"They each want to do their share," said someone to him.

"I guess so," was his reply. "And they're well fitted to divide the business between them. Boston can do the thinking, 'Frisco the fighting, Chicago the feeding, and New York the paying!"

Even the Universities were aflame. A battalion of 1,000 strong came from Harvard and Yale—fine, manly, well-exercised young men whom baseball and rowing had formed into superb specimens of their race.

The standing army was not large, but Americans soon adapt themselves to military requirements, and General Smithson, who was in command, had no trouble in drafting to Boston and New York 100,000 men who formed the First Army Corps for service in Germany. Owing to the vast distances in America and the delays rendered necessary by questions of outfit, the whole of these were drawn from the eastern states lying within reasonable distance of the two ports of embarkation.

This was a blow to the City of the Golden Gate. The San Franciscan does not care to wait for his excitement. He wants it quick, and he swore loudly when he sniffed the battle from afar and found that he was left out.

It was sad, and sad beyond all others to Mr. William J. Ritchie, commonly called "Gu," on the authority of certain ingenious persons who translated his first name into Spanish. He was a gentleman in whom activity was almost a disease, and who was equally at home in a bluff at poker and in holding up a Mexican card-sharper. He was a familiar figure in most European capitals, and had the useful faculty of making his visits memorable by business deals which brought himself many fortunes and left the older civilisations the better for some excellent lessons in commercial smartness. He was now enjoying the fruits of a season spent largely in Tattersall's, where he made himself dreaded for his luck and popular for his princely way of celebrating it.

And now, at first mention of a war, his restless spirit yearned for triumphs in a new sphere, for it was his firm conviction that operations on the Stock Exchange and Turf fitted a man admirably for strategic manœuvres in the tented field.

He read with joy the proclamation that any American who raised and fitted out a regiment of 800 men became de facto its Colonel, and in less than twenty-four hours he had gathered round him such a body of San Franciscans as was calculated by every appearance to excite apprehension in the German mind.

Now Col. William J. Ritchie knew General Smithson, so he took care to wire him asking that he might be permitted to join the First Army Corps. General Smithson was a good friend, but he was also a wily soldier. He found he had no room for the gallant Colonel, for the first expedition was absolutely full. But he also knew that there were only three days and a half before the date of embarkation, and that his prompt consent would enable him to confer a favour of which Colonel "Gu" could not avail himself. Thus, duty and friendship seemed thoroughly harmonious.

But herein the General over-reached himself. He had not thoroughly estimated the resourcefulness of the Westerner.

Colonel Ritchie's heart gladdened when he received the telegram, and he was soon in deep conference with the railway officials. Shortly before lunch that day he calmly informed his friends at the club that he would have to leave them. He intended to join the First Army Corps for Europe.

They looked at him in amazement.

"My dear fellow," said one of them, "it's 3,000 miles to New York."

"Three thousand odd," corrected the Colonel gravely.

"And you have three days and a half!"

"Yes," he admitted cheerfully. "A good margin for accidents."

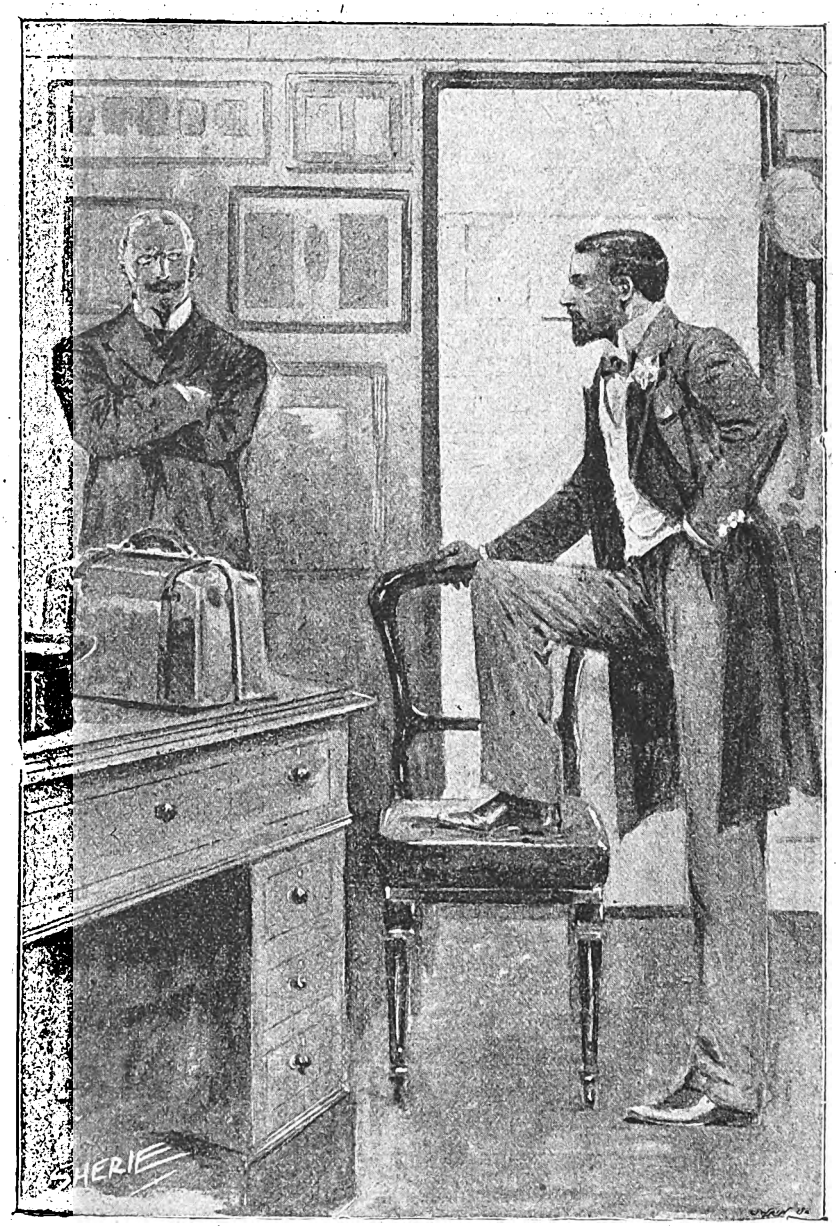
"But look here, old man," exclaimed another. "You must be jesting. The fastest train takes six days. And even if you work miracles, what about your men and their uniforms, their arms and accoutrements!"

"By Jove, yes!" responded Ritchie reflectively. "Really it's high time I saw to that. Ta, ta! It'll take me till lunch. Don't begin till I come back."

And he calmly left the room.

Unconcerned as were his movements he lost no time. He drove to the office of a well-known contractor, armed with a

Digitized by Google



"Say," he said, "I guess you are open to a deal."

small portmanteau, which he dumped down on the table.

"Say," he said, "I guess you are open to a deal. Now, I want 800 military outfits delivered complete in twenty-four hours, with all arms and accoutrements. Mustn't be a moment late or you fall flat. Can you do it, or must I go lsowhere?"

The contractor looked at him in a startled sort of way. But he knew his man.

"It's a bargain," he said. "I'll do it at two hundred dollars a head."

"Good!" exclaimed Colonel Ritchie. Then, opening his portmanteau, he discovered it full to the top with hundred dollar bills. He counted out 1,600 of these with much solemnity, and as the other proceeded to check them he sat down and rapidly wrote a form of agreement.

When the contractor had perused this document he smiled. For he saw that his apparently nonchalant customer had added these words: "400 dollars to be forfeited for each and every fit-out unfinished." But he signed without a murmur. Colonel Ritchie got back as his friends had commenced on the soup. He sat down unconcernedly.

"That bit of business has cost me twenty-five cents," he complained.

"Twenty-five cents! What do you mean?"

"For a stamp: look at it." He carelessly tossed the paper across the table, and went on with his lunch.

He had left himself only two days and a half, or sixty hours, for the journey of 3,000 miles across America. The feat looked impossible. But Ritchie regarded nothing as impossible. He calculated that by maintaining a uniform rate of fifty miles an hour he could just manage it.

The railway officials whom he interviewed were first amused, then amazed, then impressed by his proposal. When Ritchie drew out his cheque book and began to figure out sums of money they were half won. When he spoke of patriotism they agreed to consider it. When he pointed out the tremendous advertisement they would get they were convinced.

Immense excitement was caused by the announcement of this extraordinary journey. The difficulties were stupendous.

But the companies were American and energetic. By telegraph, twenty engines with cars complete, were stationed at equi-distant points along the road. Each set would run for 300 miles, and the passengers would then change cars during motion by the attachment of another engine and train placed back to back. Every minute of delay was thus obviated, and the journey would be practically unbroken.

Could it be done? That was what everyone asked, in particular the New York papers, and not least of all General Smithson.

On Tuesday the Colonel and his company entered the train, with the 800 uniforms and accoutrements duly delivered, and left San Francisco amid ringing cheers, and the train dashed off on its wonderful journey.

Fortune favours the brave. The arrangements were perfect. At the same superb speed, aided where needed by additional engines—the train flew along, passing towns and cities and villages, across vast plains, up mountain slopes, through verdant valleys. Everywhere along the line scattered groups of spectators assembled to gaze at the sudden apparition of the spectral train, which seemed to disappear as soon as it came in sight. And as it flew past there came to the occupants the sounds of cheering. It was a journey unparalleled in railway annals.

Digitized by Google

Within, the troops had a good time. They were terribly crowded, but poker and revolver practice varied the tedium and difficulties of the way. Nor was there lack of drink and infinite smoke.

But the leader of the party was serious. He passed most of his leisure in walking from one engine to the other. Every time that the hour's run showed below fifty miles he offered the engineers fifty dollars to bring up the average in the next spin.

They invariably succeeded, but they burnt the fire-boxes out of fourteen engines.

At midnight on Thursday, the train drew up at the Central Station, New York. It had completed the journey in sixty hours exactly, and without a moment's unnecessary delay. Accompanied by a whole city of shouting and cheering admirers, the regiment marched through the streets to the quay-side. They were in time!

General Smithson smiled grimly when he saw them, for he had been compelled to charter an additional steamer.

"We must make room, I suppose, Colonel," he said to Ritchie. "And if we are a bit crowded by your men, at least I can say that there will always be space available in my army for such an officer as you!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

In the Fatherland.

"Vas iss dass?"

"Das iss von telegram from der Kaiser."

They were not Germans, but New Yorkers, who spoke in this strange tongue, the lingo of the cheap clothes store in the vernacular of the American humourist. They stood on the deck of a transport which, out of sheer curiosity, had approached too near to the fleet under command of Sir Nowell Salmon, at that moment engaged in the second and more serious bombardment of Tronning.

As a consequence, the alert gunners on the shore forts, knowing the damage they could effect by striking an unarmoured ship, had sent a range-finding six-inch shell screaming over the foremast, and in obedience to an imperative order from the Admiral the transport rapidly stood out to sea again.

But it was not for long that the combined armies of England and the United States were thus kept in a state of inaction.

Admiral Mahan's ships, added to the tremendous array of British vessels which composed the three squadrons commanded by Sir Nowell Salmon, Admiral Fitzroy, and Vice-Admiral Erskine, made up a flotilla against which even the strong fortifications guarding the western entrance to the Kiel canal were of little avail.

For three long weeks the best troops of Germany, headed by their Emperor, had spent themselves in vain against the lines of Stralsund.

Sir Evelyn Wood had harassed them terribly. If they delivered an assault in force and retired after several hours of fierce and ineffective fighting, they were at once subjected to a bitter counter-attack by fresh troops hurried up by rail to some unexpected point.

When the German generals prepared a trap for this second instalment of the British plan of defence, it was either not forthcoming, or took the form of a feint which provoked and wearied the Germans.

It must be remembered that the country immediately behind Stralsund offers extraordinary difficulties to the effective manœuvering or concentration of troops, and there was no element of the impossible in a splendid British force being thus able to resist the whole of the armed strength of Germany.

The secret of Sir Evelyn Wood's success lay in the fact that the enemy could not get at him.

Truth to tell, the Kaiser Wilhelm behaved magnificently during this disastrous period. Untiring, undaunted, unostentatiously heroic, he inspired his soldiers by his presence and example. Where danger and difficulty were most intermixed the Emperor shared both with his men. The arrogance and petulance of his showman days were gone with the trivial considerations now perforce banished by the stress of the war.

The train dashed off on its wonderful journey.

His really powerful nature was developed and broadened by adverse circumstances. Unfortunately for his own happiness, he was still an actor, and what his histrionic ability had lost in naturalness it had gained in art.

For the cheerful, self-denying, valiant Emperor, who had ever a pleasant word for all ranks, and a resolute bearing in the field, was secretly tortured by the knowledge that he had been led into a foolish and disastrous war.

The quiet tenacity of purpose displayed by England, coupled with her brilliant achievements during the earlier stages of the campaign, had opened his eyes to the realities of the case. At first it was preposterous to suppose that Great Britain could stem the torrent that poured down upon her. But she did, and even pressed back the tide. Maddening as was the thought, it seemed that she might succeed from the outset against the fearful odds she was called upon to face. Now that the United States had joined her there was no longer speculation but probability, nay, even certainty, of the allies being defeated.

His kingdom impoverished, his people torn by faction, his throne in danger, no wonder that the Emperor mourned in solitude or sought a glorious death at the head of his devoted troops.

But fate had better things in store for him. Great monarch as he was, his personality was a mere item in the strange sequence of events which this, the last of all wars among civilised nations, was destined to produce.

Thus it chanced that whilst his officers and men did not spare themselves in rescuing him from obvious peril, they were aided and abetted by no less a personage than the British Tommy. For the latter could not be taught to regard the Kaiser as other than a pronounced comedian. Every camp joke centred round him and his acts. No canteen song failed to have reference to him, and stories of his prowess and oddities were in all mouths.

So Tommy took care not to kill him. That is to say, whenever a battery had a clear chance of sending a shell at the Imperial staff, it was purposely directed elsewhere, and a corporal of the 1st Royals boasted during the rest of his days that he once spared the Emperor's life during a cavalry mêlée. "I could have given him No. 2 as clean as a whistle," he said, "but I didn't fancy having a smack at the Colonel, so I jobbed a Uhlan in the eye instead."

There was not the slightest doubt that, apart from the chances of war, the Emperor must have been killed or wounded by direct design of his opponents if they had so chosen.

An intolerable feeling of helplessness paralysed the German staff. It is easy, therefore, to understand that an absolute thrill of joy manifested itself when it became known that Tronning was occupied by a mixed force of English and Americans, under the command of H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught. At last they would meet their adversary in the open.

Lord Wolseley had courteously offered the chiefship to General Smithson, but that sturdy veteran declined the honour

Digitized by Google

"I allow that I am here to do my share of the fighting," he said modestly, "but the quarrel is yours, and your men must carry it through. I calculate that we've got to see you ain't licked."

The Duke of Connaught had gained his proud position by sheer merit. His soldierly qualities were such that he must have risen to high rank in the Army were he quite destitute of the accidental help of Royal birth.

Whether in India or in Aldershot his tactical skill was often manifested in divisional operations, and in Egypt he had seen something of the actualities of war under the distinguished general who was now intrusted with supreme control of the British armies. So well was his worth known and appreciated by the people of England, that everyone believed his selection to command the second German expedition to be a wise and unprejudiced one.

Moreover, he had accompanied Sir Evelyn Wood to Stralsund, and the practical value of his acquaintance with the arrangements then made soon bore fruit when he came to dispose his forces on shore.

It will simplify matters if the main idea of the subsequent operations be now briefly outlined.

The Duke's first business was to seize the Kiel Canal, and, with the aid of the fleet, to capture Kiel, the strong fortress which dominates the Baltic end of the water-way.

He was concurrently to concentrate his forces upon Neuminster, where three lines of railway, that from Heide on the north-west, Rendsburgh on the north, and Kiel on the north-east, converge.

His next forward movement would be towards Oldesloe, where he might expect to meet serious opposition, whilst to left and right of his front lay the fortified towns of Lubeck and Hamburg.

If he succeeded in breaking through this difficult barrier, Sir Evelyn Wood would forthwith advance upon Rostock, and thence strive to join the Duke of Connaught somewhere in the neighbourhood of Wittenberg on the Elbe, whence a combined effort could be made to reach Berlin.

In England much uneasiness was felt concerning the outcome of the new departure, and more than one speaker gave voice to this sentiment in the House of Commons.

Mr. Balfour silenced these doubters in a sentence.

"This war cannot end," he said with solemn emphasis, "until we have either occupied Paris, Berlin, and Mo cow, or the rulers of our enemies have sought for peace upon terms to be dictated by us."

Thenceforth there was no questioning, but grim perseverance towards the yet distant goal.

At first the Duke of Connaught was much puzzled to know how to deal effectively with his curious allies. Personally accustomed to the rigid and punctilious methods of English military life, he was astounded at the seeming carelessness of detail that obtained among the United States troops. Indeed, he was secretly scandalised by their free and easy methods, and by the unwonted familiarity between officers and men.

But he was far too keen an observer to fail to note that beneath all this outward laxity there was an unfailing obedience, a strong sense of duty, and a readiness to make light of difficulties which went far to atone for the absence of external discipline.

Anxious to meet their views to the utmost extent, he consulted General Smithson upon the matter.

"You must leave 'em to me, Prince," said the U.S. commander, with a quiet twinkle of mirth in his eye. "Send along an aide-de-camp or two to act with brigadiers when you want your ideas explained, but, for goodness' sake, tell the gentlemen in gold lace to leave things alone once they are in motion! My men do the thinking for themselves, and they'll get cross if they're expected to fight like machines. They'll obey orders all right enough, but they must be left to carry 'em out in their own way."

"I assure you, General Smithson," replied the Duke, "that it was furthest from my thoughts to dream of interfering in any way, save to seek your full co-operation in my detailed scheme, of which you will always know the complete scope and purport. I was thinking rather of commissariat and departmental arrangements."

"Nearly every man in the crowd has been accustomed to help himself since he was able to walk," said Smithson, indicating his vast army with a comprehensive sweep of his field-glasses. "If the eatables and ammunition are alongside, Prince, they'll get 'em all right."

The Duke smiled genially and the conversation ended. He trusted to the future to elucidate all matters of which he was in doubt, and it did.

An effective column was constituted for the occupation of Neuminster. It consisted of 5,000 British and 5,000 American infantry, with a strong backing of guns and cavalry.

From Hamburg and Lubeck a somewhat similar German force had been thrown forward along the Ahrensbok line. Unknown to both parties, a race ensued for the possession of Neuminster, and of course the defenders won by some hours, as the resources of the country were fully at their service.

Viscount Falmouth commanded the little expedition, and with him, as the lawyers say, were Colonel Ritchie, in charge of the United States troops, Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. G. H. Gough, of the 14th Hussars, with his own regiment, the two regiments of volunteer cavalry, including the Middlesex Yeomanry, and Colonel Lockyer, A.R., with the guns.

The Germans . . . placed Neuminster in a state of defence.

The Germans speedily took advantage of their priority in time to place Neuminster in a state of defence. Field works were at once started on the north of the town, houses loopholed, roads barricaded, and guns mounted in advantageous positions.

After a severe march across the level and sandy plains of the Schleswig-Holstein peninsula, the British advance guard met and drove back the German cavalry scouts, and Viscount Falmouth rode rapidly to the front to try and ascertain the enemy's disposition.

"They are strongly posted," said the Brigadier.

"Guess we'll have trouble before we see the inside of the town from this end," said Ritchie.

Something in his voice caused Lord Falmouth to look at him.

"Don't you think we ought to deliver a direct attack?" he inquired.

"I guess not," was the reply. "They're kinder expecting it straight away, and they'll raise us a hundred before the draw. All their preparations are made to meet us on this side, and I think it will pay to be a bit shy of coming in on their terms. Now, supposing the guns and horses were to stop here and keep all snug whilst we squirm round to the rear of the town, it will upset their pot. There can't be any shelter trenches on the south, and our German friends won't fight any better because they are cut off from any possible help."

"In other words," said Lord Falmouth, who knew the language of poker, "if we ante high enough, they won't feel inclined to bluff."

Digitized by Google

"That's a principle of the American Constitution," answered Ritchie.

General Reichshoffer was puzzled to account for the delay that ensued. True, his guns were actively engaged by the British artillery, and a cloud of skirmishers enveloped his front, but there was an absence of the definite attack which he expected.

The reputation enjoyed by his assailants did not warrant any assumption of undue timidity on their part, and at last the German general lost patience.

He sent out three regiments, supported by a battery and two squadrons of cavalry, to conduct a reconnaissance in force.

The line of British skirmishers fell back steadily before this development, and the guns also were compelled to change their position.

Anxiously watching the progress of events from a church tower, Reichshoffer was still more astonished as he beheld this manœuvre.

Elated by his success, the commander of the reconnaissance allowed his men to get a little out of hand in the eagerness with which they achieved their task, and he did not see the rapid detour made by Gough's horsemen through a slight declivity, with the evident intention to take the advancing Germans in flank. From his elevated position, Reichshoffer perceived the movement clearly enough, and he roared orders from the balustrade to a staff officer beneath, to ride his best and recall the detachment.

It was too late.

Barely had the officer started on his mission, when the rattle of rifle-fire in the rear distracted attention to the determined attack now being delivered in that direction, and long before the aide had reached the reconnaissance party, Colonel Gough had dissipated them into thin air, capturing their guns and cutting the cavalry support into ribands.

The beautiful order and precision of the German forces in Neuminster now gave way to the wildest confusion.

A rush was made to line the hedgerows and garden walls on the south of the town, but before an effective defence could be arranged, the 7th Pennsylvania and the 1st Battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment, were racing up the Markt Strasse.

The struggle for the possession of the town was short but stubborn. It was characterised by more than one noteworthy incident of personal bravery on the part of both attackers and defenders.

A German officer, deserted by his company when a fierce onrush was made by the Derbyshires, stood alone in the centre of a narrow street.

His sword-arm was broken by a bullet, but he calmly drew a revolver and fired steadily three times into the mass of his assailants. The Englishman leading the advance called upon him to surrender, but the gallant Brunswicker's reply was a bullet which ripped off his adversary's shoulder-knot.

An instant later he was knocked down, and it is to the credit of the chivalrous Tommies that they did not give him a vicious bayonet thrust as they passed, for he had wounded two of their comrades.

An American officer, cheering on the leading company of the 7th Pennsylvania, who had now penetrated to the north end of Neuminster, carelessly leapt his horse across a barricade and rode forward for a few yards.

He was momentarily separated from his men, and at that instant half-a-dozen Uhlans, returning precipitately from the wreck of the reconnaissance party dashed up to him.

Half frenzied with the sudden collapse of their assumed victory, the Uhlans resolved to pay off the score in the person of one enemy at least. It did not seem that the life of this fine soldier from West Point was worth a moment's purchase.

But he was an excellent horseman, and cool as an iceberg. Pulling his charger back on to its hind legs and wheeling him simultaneously, at the imminent risk of a headlong fall, the American disconcerted the aim of the first two lances levelled at him, and received a sword cut on the forte of his own weapon.

Yet another lance darted forward, but again missed, for the West Point man had bent forward on his horse's neck and fired a revolver shot under the animal's head. More by luck than design, the bullet found a resting-place in the thorax of one of the six, but still the odds were terribly uneven.

Grasping his rifle by the barrel, he smashed off the stock against the head of the first Uhlan he encountered.

The Uhlans were desperately in earnest and heedless of their own safety, for rifle-shots were now whistling through the crowd, as the men realised that they must risk hitting their officer if they would save him.

But a remarkable diversion occurred just then. A youthful but gigantic private of the Derbyshire Regiment, who had early grasped the niceties of the situation, caught a riderless German horse on the near side of the barrier, jumped on to his back, and in a few powerful bounds was in the midst of the fray.

Grasping his rifle by the barrel he smashed off the stock against the head of the first Uhlan he encountered. He raised the heavy weapon again to put it to a similar use, but only in time to save himself from a well delivered cut from a man on the near side.

Carried forward by his first wild rush, the Derbyshire man was driven, unarmed, between two of the Uhlans. Never losing his head for a fraction of a second, he saw that neither was ready to lunge at him, so he threw out his arms, kicked his charger fiercely to urge him on, and succeeded in dragging both of his opponents backwards out of their saddles. He clashed their heads together as though they were feather pillows, and flung the pair senseless to the ground.

By this time the American had run one gentleman from Brandenburg through the body, and the sixth having got clear of the mêlée, galloped off in the hope of escaping. But the officer rode after him, and within a few yards the Uhlan threw away his sword and raised his right arm aloft in token of surrender.

The West Pionter trotted back towards his rescuer, held out his hand, and said heartily: "Shake!"

The Englishman responded as cordially, and then dismounted to rejoin his regiment.

Lord Falmouth had witnessed the whole incident. Leaning over towards an officer of the Derbyshires, he said:

"What is the name of that youngster?"

"Oh," was the reply, "that's Jones of Balliol."

"Jones, of Balliol?" repeated his lordship, puzzled by the glibness of the answer.

"Yes. He failed for Sandhurst, so his father hoped to cure his thickheadedness by sending him to Oxford for a couple of years. He has won undying fame by getting himself chucked out of the Empire last boat-race night at 8.15."

"The Duke must know of this," observed his lordship, and the acute reader can be trusted to understand which of the two incidents he meant.

Anyhow, Jones of Balliol came out of the campaign a better man than he went it, for he commanded a company in his own regiment.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

TWO FRIENDS.

PIERRE DURAND and Jacques Duval had been brought up together, so to speak.

As small boys their parents, friends of long standing, had taken them to play in the Luxembourg, and it was while making sand-houses that their intimacy had commenced. A little later, when short trousers had taken the place of kilts they had been sent to the same pension. Seated side by side at their studies, always in the same classes, they had continued to see each other regularly every day. Their fondness for each other was so great that they were not contented with merely their hours of work in common, but when Sunday came they passed the afternoon together at the home of one or the other. From the pension to the Lycé, from the Lycé to the Business College, their affection had only increased.

When the time came for starting into business, as each one judged the other perfectly indispensable to him, they decided to form a partnership. And, in fact, it was a very happy idea for the house, "Durand & Duval, Wholesale Hardware Merchants," enjoyed an unequalled prosperity.

Durand and Duval lived in the same building in which they carried on their business, and went downstairs at seven every morning, and worked industriously in the shop until seven in the evening, thus affording their clerks an example of faithfulness overseeing everything, and, on occasions, not even disdaining to serve a customer. They allowed themselves barely an hour at noon for luncheon, and, it is needless to add, took this meal together.

In the evening they were the last ones to leave the shop and go upstairs to dine.

Of course, the thought of attending a theatre or dance without the other had never occurred to one of them. Besides, no one of their acquaintances would have thought of inviting one without the other. To their friends, Pierre and Jacques formed a sort of household which one would have hesitated to break, and, usually, one invitation did for the two. One wrote as naturally "Monsieur Durand and Monsieur Duval" as one writes "Monsieur and Madame Dupont."

Pierre and Jacques—have we said that they were the same age?—were in their thirty-third year at present, and this existence which they were leading seemed as if it were to continue indefinitely, when a cable dispatch from America came to break up the monotony.

An uncle, of whom Jacques had formerly been very fond, had fallen ill in New York. He summoned his nephew to him.

Pierre, to whom Jacques read the message, uttered a cry almost of anguish.

"And you are going away?"

"But, my dear friend, I must go! If it were merely a question of money I should not hesitate to refuse to go. We are rich, happy, accustomed to our way of life, and I would not for a good deal run the risks of such a long journey and leave you all the care of our business; but it is a sick man who calls for me—and a poor man, which is a greater reason why I should go."

"You are right, my friend; you must go."

And Pierre pressed Jacques' hand.

"At least, don't stay too long," he added. "Remember that I am alone here, and how desolate I shall be without you. You will see something new your mind will be taken up studying the ways of a new country, which you have never before seen——"

"Yes; but if I make any friends there I shall have to leave them on my return—and you are sure to find me unchanged towards you—while you, you will go about by yourself, you will amuse yourself, you——"

Here the voice of Jacques trembled a little.

"You will perhaps meet someone you will wish to marry, and then what is to become of me without my lifelong companion?"

"But I never think of it."

"No, not now. But you may think of it. At times, I have seen in you already a tendency in that direction. You have resisted it up to the present, a little through love of your liberty, and a great deal on account of your old comrade and because you fear his sarcasm—but once away from me——"

"Do not fear that, my friend! I have no more desire than you have to put a chain about my neck, and what would become of our card games and our fine walks in the evening? No, indeed; have no fear!"

Jacques packed his trunk, telegraphed for a stateroom, and that very evening set out for Hayre accompanied by his old friend, who bade him an affectionate farewell at the pier.

Jacques was kept three months at the bedside of his uncle, whose recovery was slow. Regularly twice a week the two friends wrote to each other.

Jacques' letters were always filled with accounts of his health, his new existence, the interesting customs of this new and clever people. He did not neglect, in his correspondence, even to give his partner the most minute information concerning the hardware business in the New World, and to advise some changes suggested to him by the good, practical sense of the Americans.

Digitized by Google

Pierre's letters had, on the contrary, gradually diminished in interest and length. Toward the last he had sent but notes of a few lines, as if he were afraid, if he wrote at length, of letting some secret, which he was trying to guard, escape him.

This brevity, of course, had surprised Jacques.

What is this mystery? he wondered.

But, as the hour of return was approaching he had silenced his curiosity, certain of soon being enlightened as to the reasons for this new attitude of his friend.

"I shall arrive this evening.—Jacques."

When Pierre received this telegram he turned pale and called to his wife.

"Jacques is coming back, and I have never dared to tell him of our marriage."

"Really; this very dear friend, of whose disapproval you stand in such dread! When I think that it was fear of his blame which made you hesitate to marry me——"

And putting her arm round the neck of her husband Madame Durand seemed to reproach him for his lack of eagerness.

"Yes, I confess it," said Pierre, smiling. "I hesitated, but not for long; and these beautiful eyes made short work of my indecision."

A kiss finished the sentence—from which it was easy to conclude that if Jacques' opinion had had a moment's weight with his friend, the latter did not to-day regret the step he had taken. He added, however:

"Poor Jacques! this will be a blow to him! Just think, we lived together so closely united—when I remember that he is expecting to take up our life again in our old apartments——"

Madame Durand smiled.

"Are we not better off where we are? And whatever pleasure you found in the company of your old friend, are you not happier here, pampered by your wife? Pampered by two women, for my sister lives with us."

"Certainly; and if I have a regret, my dear, it is for not having known you sooner; but it is not myself that it is a question of just now, but Jacques. What will be the best way to break it to him?"

"Come, don't get nervous. There are two hours yet. He doesn't get here till seven. Before that we may perhaps find some ingenious method."

"Yes; I beg of you, my dear, think of some way. I trust myself to you. I am so troubled, so worried at the thought of his consternation——"

"Take courage. Women are more clever than men, and I have hopes of arranging everything. Let me consult with my sister."

* * * * *

Jacques had just entered his home—their home he still believed.

Pierre was awaiting him, and the two friends fell into each other's arms.

"At last I see you again," said Jacques, after the first greetings were over; "and now you will explain to me the mystery. When I think that in your letters——"

But he did not finish the sentence, his glance fell on Pierre's coat, a coat of the latest fashion and cut, which contrasted strongly with the clothes he used to wear—generally worn to the thread. From the coat his eyes rose to the cravat—and what a cravat! Brilliant in colour and so artistically tied!

"Did you tie that cravat?"

The proof of the crime was obvious. Pierre did not even try to deny it. He had no desire to, besides.

"No; I did not."

"A woman did—only a woman could have!"

"Yes; I am married!"

"Unhappy man!"

A little later, and it was the word "wretch" which Jacques, in his anger, let fall.

The other excused himself as best he could.

He said:

"It was a chance which did it all. She is so charming, so pretty! I met her one evening—at Martin's. They had invited you and me—I was bored all by myself—I went—I did not suspect anything, I assure you—she was there—I was conquered at once—and you would have been, too, I am sure of it."

"Oh!"

A gesture of denial from Jacques, but Pierre continued.

"Yes, you would have been—to see her was to love her. If you could know her! what grace! what charm! Ah, you will not be long in understanding me—come, and you will pardon me!"

"Never!"

"At least you will dine with me this evening?"

"Indeed, no!"

It took a good half hour for Pierre to persuade his friend, but at last he yielded.

"Yes; I will go with you, because I do not wish to appear to sulk; but it is purely from politeness, and that I may not seem to be on bad terms with my partner's wife—for now it is all ended. I see very plainly—I have no longer a friend, only a business partner!"

Pierre made no answer to this, but his moustache hid a slight smile.

They started to Pierre's home. On the way Jacques thought. "What a fool Pierre is! I am sure his wife must be ugly-looking or ill-tempered. A widow, he said—doubtless a good schemer, who worked upon his 'naiveté.' Oh, it's enough to make one laugh!"

On their arrival Pierre presented him.

"Madame Durand, my friend, Jacques Duval!"

Jacques was all ready to salute her coldly, but at the sight of the pretty face he saw before him his coldness vanished, and he met her with a compliment.

"I am delighted, madame."

And, in a low voice to Pierre:

"You rascal, but she is charming!"

Pierre excused himself for a moment.

"I leave you two together—get acquainted!"

And Jacques was invited to come and sit upon the divan by the side of the mistress of the house.

At the end of ten minutes he was completely won over.

She talked to him on the subjects in which he was most interested, as if she guessed his taste and preferences.

She was a most charming listener, and suddenly he found himself envying his friend's fate.

"She is absolutely delightful, this woman! What luck Pierre is in! Ah, I understand how for such a woman he could renounce bachelorhood, and I have not the heart to wish—"

Digitized by Google

The dinner was delicious, and Jacques had to admit to himself that he had never had a better appetite.

"You will come to-morrow, of course," Madame Durand said to him on leaving.

"I?"

"Yes; to-morrow, and every day—I wish it."

"But——"

"You must, otherwise I should reproach myself, for not for worlds would I be the cause of coldness in your relations with my husband."

And as Jacques still hesitated, "I wish it," she said, and laid her white, soft hand lightly on his.

"So be it, I obey," Jacques answered, moved by this unexpected caress.

An adorable smile rewarded him.

The next day Jacques returned, and the next, and every day of that week.

"Well, what do you think of my wife?" Pierre asked him, when the two were alone together in the shop.

"Ah, my friend, I think her——"

An expressive gesture completed the sentence.

"Then you no longer disapprove?"

"Say rather I was a fool ever to blame you—if I had been in your place, I——"

"It makes me very happy to know you and my wife are congenial. Just think how I should have felt if you had not liked each other! I only hope it may be lasting, and that you may not change your opinion."

"I change my opinion about your wife? The more I see of her the better I like her, my friend."

"Heaven help you!"

And saying this the rascal Pierre had the same enigmatical smile under his moustache.

That happened which was bound to happen.

Submitted daily to the same influence, entertained by the amiable conversations of his friend's wife, touched by the marks of affection which she lavished upon him, flattered by the importance which she seemed to attach to his slightest word, Jacques passed helplessly through all the gamut of sensations and suddenly—he had been home not quite two weeks—he recognised the fatal truth, he was in love with Madame Durand.

"Well, this is fine," cried the poor man, when he had looked clearly into his own heart. "What must I do now?"

"As soon as the shop closes you will join me?" said Pierre.

"No," answered Jacques; "don't count upon me this evening."

"Why not?"

Jacques tried to make an excuse, but it would not come.

He hesitated, stammered, and urged by the questions of his friend, he ended by bursting into tears, and telling the truth:

"Ah, my friend, I am a wretch, I love your wife!"

"Very well, marry her!"

"What?"

"You idiot! Do you think I should have submitted to such a course if I had not known where it would end? But it is not my wife that you know. The same day of your return she went into the country—and I am going to telegraph to her to return this evening. You will like her, too, I am sure; but, by the way, it is her sister with whom you are in love, and nothing hinders you from marrying her."

"Ah!"

"Come, shake hands, brother-in-law."

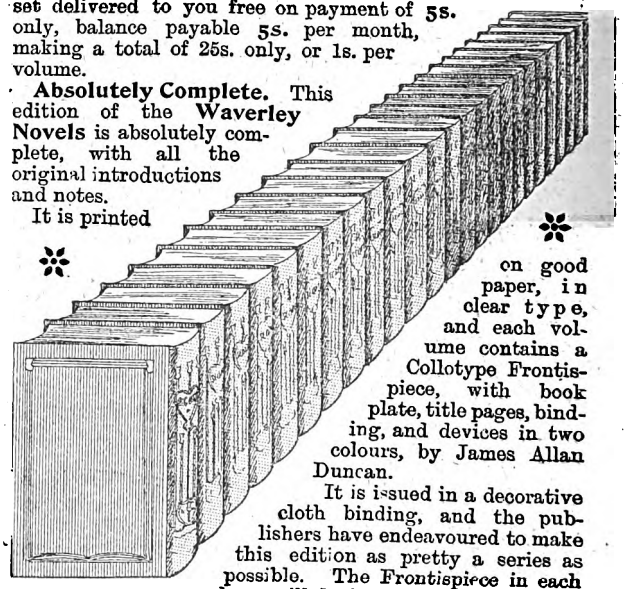
G. KENNEDY.

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.



Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora Melvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

speedily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13 st. 8 lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; the man never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Starmheim, Germany, writes "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

MAYNARD'S CHEAP POPULAR MUSIC. Songs: "How Can I Break the News," "The Empty Chair," "My Little Birds can Tell," "Come Back, Forget, Forgive," "English Rose." Just Published: Song and Fantasia on above popular melodies, by Ezra Read. All 2d. each. Post free, 2½d. Lists gratis. Trade supplied.—R. Maynard 58 High Street, Bloomsbury.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX. ROSS, 62, Tooba d's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

£20 Manufacturers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. Set I.ld. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Ayers

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; ¼lb., 1 4 1lb., 2 4 including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & CO'S CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens has neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works. Birmingham.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keatings Lozenges

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsom Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Manuse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

10,000

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS, AMOUNTING AT ORDINARY RETAIL PRICE TO £625,

Also £100 IN FREE MONEY PRIZES,

WILL BE GIVEN AWAY

As follows:

1st Prize £50 To Competitor solving four or more of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

2nd Prize £25 To Competitor solving three of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them

3rd Prize £15 To Competitor solving two of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

4th Prize £10 To Competitor solving only one of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

Having purchased the entire stock of a large Christmas Card Firm, at considerably less than half the original cost of production, as well as several other important lots at ridiculously low prices for cash, we have decided this year, for the first time, to deal direct with the Public instead of through the shopkeepers, and are making up monster packets (sold in the ordinary way for at least 3/6), containing one dozen choice assorted Christmas Cards, for 2/- per packet, Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom (Foreign Postage, 1 - extra). With each of these packets, by way of advertisement, we shall present gratis to every purchaser a most interesting, instructive, and amusing Christmas present. This article is sold retail at 1/3, and is in great demand for winter evenings.

In addition to this, the above £100 Free Cash Prizes will be given away amongst the competitors who can make out the correct names of one or more of the six stone fruits, which the following mixed letters will spell, viz.,

RRHYEC, EEEGGGANR, CHEAP, LUMP, TAPIOCR TARNICENE.

The only conditions Competitors have to comply with to qualify them to receive one of the above Christmas presents, and to compete for the Free Cash Prizes, are as follows: Send in your solutions, and enclose Postal Order for 2/- for our Monster Packet of Christmas Cards, together with stamped addressed envelope for sending your Prize Money at the close of the Competition. The packet of Cards, and the Christmas Present, will be sent upon receipt of your order, but the Prize Money will not be forwarded until a few days after the close of the Competition, which will positively be on Thursday, December 22nd, 1898. Competitors are advised to send in their orders without delay. Address: FINE ART COMPANY, 92A Isledon Road, Holloway, London.

Digitized by Google

AIDS TO ACCURACY.

In the Christmas number of Short Stories will begin a new serial by C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne, author of "Captain Kettle." It will be entitled "Sandy Carmichael," and will be profusely illustrated. Do not fail to tell your friends about it.

Amateur.—Next time you endeavour to take your baby's photograph, why not try the method adopted by a certain North country photographer, which, I am told, is a great success. He has a little kitten, which at these times he places on the top of the camera, and during the process a few pulls at the animal's tail suffice to make the animal active, and at the same time to fix the child's gaze.

R. D.—To keep a racehorse in even moderate condition in England, with proper attendants, costs £325 a year.

S. T.—It is quite a mistake to suppose that the pilgrims introduced into the presence of the Pope, kneel down and kiss his bare toe. The real facts of the case are that the pilgrims kiss a cross embroidered on the toe of one of the shoes which His Holiness wears on these occasions.

Uni.—The unicorn was one of the supporters in the naval arms of Scotland. When James VI. of Scotland succeeded to the throne of England as James I., he introduced the unicorn as a support for the Royal arms in substitution of the red dragon of Wales, introduced by Henry VII. The fabulous animal has the head, neck and body of the horse, the legs of the stag and the tail of the lion.

W. E. S. asks: "Are there any parts of the body that do not grow old with the advance of years?"———The brain and the heart, if properly used, do not grow old like the rest of the body. The nutrition of the brain is specially provided for by Nature, and thus remains vigorous to the last. With regard to the heart it is a well-known fact that it attains its greatest development, in both men and women, in old age.

T. H.—I am told that the Prince of Wales's daily correspondence amounts to five and six hundred letters.

W. H.—Yes, it is true that the majority of the book-keepers and cashiers employed in Japanese business houses are Chinamen. They are given the preference for such positions because of their honesty. Although it is commonly understood that a Chinaman will cheat if he gets the chance, as a matter of fact, if he is entrusted with money he keeps it safely, and if, in making a promise, he utters the words "Can do," these words are as good as a bond.

P. B. asks: "Do the muscles of the face ever grow tired?"———Rather, if you use them sufficiently. Anyone who has spent the best part of a morning in the dentist's chair knows for himself. Caricaturists are often troubled with this complaint. After an hour or so of contorting their faces in the efforts of trying to assume the expressions of other people, they find it necessary to rest their faces, either by lying down for a few minutes, or to go out for a walk with the determination to look at things and not at people.

P. P.—Paper made from seaweed is a growing industry in France. It is so transparent that in some instances it has been used instead of glass.

Nellie writes to ask why a photograph often looks so grotesque in a looking-glass.———Both sides of a face are hardly ever alike, and when a photo is seen through a looking-glass, the differences are exactly reversed, and the peculiarities belonging to the right side are seen on the left side, and vice versâ. This often entirely alters the expression of the face, and so makes it quite unlike the original portrait when seen through a mirror.

Athlete anxiously inquires whether gymnastic exercise is at all likely to check a man's growth.———I should say not. A man is not made of indiarubber or any such substance of the kind, that can only be increased in breadth by diminishing in length. I should not be surprised, however, if great muscular development would not tend to slightly check a weedy growth. In any case, it might easily appear to do so, for a well-proportioned man of six feet never gives one an impression of as great a height as a lean and lanky individual of the same stature.

Litho.—The best lithographic stones are obtained from Bavarian quarries. These quarries are approaching exhaustion, and the stone is consequently increasing in price.

An American Reader of S.S., who is also an ardent cyclist, writes to tell me what riding in the prairies is like. "Of course," he writes, "the chief feature is the almost total absence of hills. For hundreds, and, in certain directions, thousands of miles, one can spin along the trails without encountering a hill big enough to affect one's speed either way. For the greater part of the year the old Indian trails, now the generally accepted roads of the country, are as wide as a waggon, and the smooth surface is composed of a very thin layer of soft soil that makes one think he is riding over velvet. The great and only drawback to cycling on the prairie is that when the wind blows you can only ride in one direction.

H. B. N. asks: "How long should one stay after a formal lunch?"———The usual thing to do is to go back to the drawing-room for a short time, and take one's departure after the lapse of about half-an-hour.

N. H.—Emperors and empresses, kings and queens, write to each other as brothers and sisters. Reigning grand dukes also enjoy this privilege when addressing kings, but monarchs not possessing royal honours are designated as cousins.

D. W.—The scientific reason given for the curly nature of the African's hair is that the curls deflect the rays of the tropical sun, thus preventing their more severe penetration into the brain. In the transmission of light it is a law that every intervening object with which a ray comes in contact bends and diverts it in another direction.

B. B. D. asks: "Can you tell me when it first became fashionable to go out of town during certain seasons of the year?"———This is such a very ancient custom that it is impossible to tell you when it originated. Evidence is gathered from the Egyptian monuments that the leading members of the aristocracy had large estates in which their mansions stood, and upon these were kept horses, cattle, poultry, and a large number of servants. The contemporaries of Cicero not only dwelt in Rome, but at certain seasons left the city, and went to reside in their villas on the shores of the Mediterranean.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either whole paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

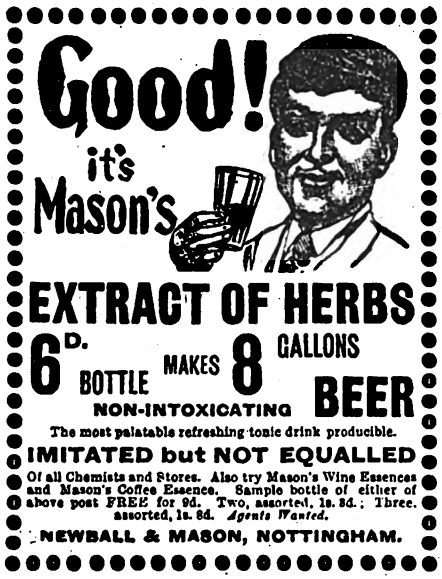
Series discount: 5 per cent. for 18, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 29th, if intended for the Issue on sale Dec. 13th, and dated Dec. 17th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME



The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

GIGANTIC AUTUMN SALE, 1898.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories 26/11/98 when writing.

A Stock of 10,000 PATENT WADDED QUILTS, TORALIUMS, OR BED COVERS

(as Illustration).

Covered with Oriental Reversible Soft Sateen with double border. Size 54in. by 60in. These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Three Quilts for 10/-, or Six for 19/6, or Twelve for 38/-

Sale Price 3/6 Each. Post Free G.B. ex.

At an Enormous Reduction to Clear Out.

The Dowager Lady GUISE writes: Leyden Dene, Bournemouth, Dec. 19th.—Please send three more of the wadded Quilts for 10/-, cheque enclosed.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price.

2/- HEARTHRUGS (Regd.)

In REVERSIBLE RICH TURKEY PATTERNS, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft. wide. These HEARTHRUGS have gained a world-wide reputation for MAGNIFICENCE, CHEAPNESS, and UTILITY, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Regd.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

6ft. by 9ft.	7/6		10½ft. by 12ft.	18/0
8ft. by 9ft.	9/0		12ft. by 12ft.	21/0
6ft. by 12ft.	10/6	REDUCED	9ft. by 15ft.	19/6
9ft. by 9ft.	11/0	SALE	12ft. by 13½ft.	22/0
9ft. by 10½ft.	13/6	PRICE.	12ft. by 15ft.	25/6
9ft. by 12ft.	15/0		12ft. by 18ft.	30/0
9ft. by 13½ft.	16/6		12ft. by 21ft.	35/6

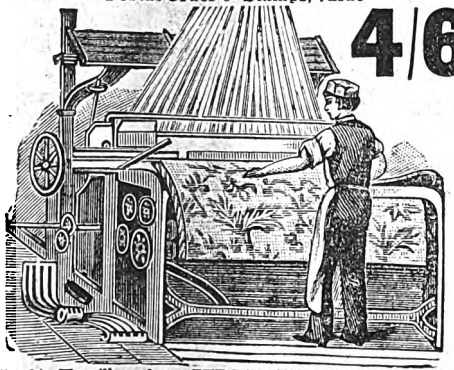
Octagon Villa, The Lizard, R.S.O., 15/8/98.—J. CARWARDINE, Esq., writes: "I am very pleased with the Carpet you sent me. I have saved 50 per cent. by giving you the order. I paid half as much again to a local tradesman for Carpets the same quality a year ago. I have never been so pleased of any former purchase."

Also RICH VELVET PILE STAIR CARPETS, bordered to match, 18in. wide, 1/8 per yard; 22½in. wide, 2/- per yard; 27in. wide, 2/3 per yard.

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

H.R.H. Princé L. of Battenberg. H.R.H. Prince K. Bigit Siam. Marquis of Breadalbane. Sir Henry de Bathe. Sir Henry Bellingham. Sir E. H. Blair, Bart. H.I.H. Eugénie de Christoforo. Princess Paleologce Nicephorce Commence. Duchess of Wellington. Marchioness of Breadalbane. Marchioness of Hastings. Archbishop of York. Princess de Croy.

To Readers of "Short Stories," 26/11/98, on receipt of Postal Order or Stamps, value



4/6

(Regd.) We will send you THE LARGEST GENUINE REVERSIBLE CARPET in BRUSSELS PATTERN WITH RUG ever sold at the price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

SPECIAL OFFER—2 CARPETS and 2 RUGS, 8s. [Cut this out.]

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories when writing.

We rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone, No. 948. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Colossal Sale of Rich Velvet Pile Real Sale Price

BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 30/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £3 14s. inclosed."

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for parting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.	11/-	VELVET	9ft. by 12ft.	38/-
6ft. by 9ft.	18/-	PILE	11ft. by 12ft.	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.	23/-	BRUSSELS	12ft. by 13½ft.	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.	28/-	CARPET	12ft. by 16ft.	69/-
9ft. by 10½ft.	33/-	SQUARES.	12ft by 18ft.	77/-

Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel of excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Ramsden, Charlbury, 4/8/98.—Lady HICKS BEACH writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson and Son send her one of their 'Queen's Royal' Carpets, 9ft. by 9ft., 11/-? Cheque enclosed. The other parcel received safely, and I am pleased with it."

PRODIGIOUS SALE of the "PRUDENTIAL"

TURKEY PATTERN CARPETS (Regd).

Reversible, woven throughout, bordered, richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9		9ft. by 15ft.	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	5/11	REDUCED	12ft. by 12ft.	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	7/6	SALE	12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	9/6	PRICE.	12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg.), to match above Carpets sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer. Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8/-, or Twelve for 15/6, sterling value.

Short Stories CARPET COUPON. 26/11/98.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

SPECIAL 1898.

SPECIALLY REDUCED INTRODUCTION SALE PARCEL WITH FREE GIFT

enclosed, consisting of

1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin Hearthrug, average size 6 feet by 3 feet, perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush Bed Rug, Sofa Cover, or Table Cover, double warp, very heavy, size 50 inches by 78 inches.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin Door Mats, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant Hair Brush, highly finished, with mirror back.

THE LOT 10/6

Postage 9d. extra.

"Given" Away.

Providing SHORT STORIES Coupon, 26/11/98, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND with coloured eyes and gilt feet. Cash returned if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 518. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 3RD, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

LET

no foreign power disguise from itself the consequences of forcing war upon this country. The men of Great Britain are, without doubt, the strongest and most determined on sea or land. In a just quarrel they are stern, invincible, and undivided. Their wealth and resources are incalculable. Their energy without bounds. Still, there are many individual exceptions in this great national bulk of fearless strength. Some are found who seem hopelessly out of the running; who go about their share of the world's work listlessly, in a half-hearted manner. To the "wild joy of living" is an unknown sensation. If they eat or drink, or do anything out of the ordinary course, they are liable to the severest penalties of headache, nausea, indigestion, nervous tremors, and many other disagreeable reminders that they are but feeble folk. The real truth is, they are Never Well, and they generally despair of attaining to that degree of health which so largely contributes to make life worth living. It is to such that BEECHAM'S PILLS are particularly recommended. This medicine is the most effective ever discovered for the successful treatment of nervous dyspepsia—and it is generally nervous dyspepsia to which these gloomy, languid, silently-suffering individuals are a prey—but BEECHAM'S PILLS will change all that; will so tone up the stomach, so improve nutrition, so perfectly regulate the functions of the liver, and so purify the blood, that with vigorous manhood or womanhood again established, happiness must surely COME!

THEM

ALL

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

70,000 CHRISTMAS GIFTS

TO THE READERS OF

"SHORT STORIES,"

INCLUDING A

CASH PRIZE OF FIFTY POUNDS.

THE GIFT OF A

HANDSOME WRITING CASE

Will be presented to every Reader of "Short Stories" forming not less than twelve words out of the letters in the word "ENGRAVINGS," as for instance, SING, RAGE, VAN, SAGE, GIG, etc., whilst the Reader forming the LARGEST number will receive, in addition,

A Cash Prize of £50.

HAVING PURCHASED AN ENORMOUS STOCK OF

HIGH-CLASS CHRISTMAS CARDS,

At considerably less than half the original cost, we have decided to offer them direct to the Readers of "Short Stories," and we are therefore making up Monster Packets (sold in the ordinary way for at least 3s. 6d.), containing one dozen choice assorted Christmas Cards for 2s. per packet, Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom (Foreign Postage, 1s. extra). With each of these packets we shall PRESENT GRATIS a Certificate giving the rules, and entitling the Holder to compete, absolutely and entirely free of charge, for the above Gifts and Prizes. Every purchaser of the above Packet of Christmas Cards forming not less than twelve words out of the letters in the word "ENGRAVINGS," will receive a handsome GIFT, being lined throughout, and fitted with Compartments for writing paper, Envelopes, Answered Letters, etc., with Handsome Cover and Nickel Spring Lock, whilst the Reader forming the LARGEST NUMBER of words will receive, in addition, a

A BEAUTIFULLY FINISHED WRITING CASE,

CASH PRIZE OF FIFTY POUNDS

Every application must be accompanied by the following Coupon, and Postal Order for 2s. (or 26 stamps).

"Short Stories" Coupon.

On receipt of this Coupon, accompanied by a Postal Order for 2s. (or 26 stamps), we agree to forward, securely packed and carriage paid, our together with a CERTIFICATE giving the rules and entitling the holder to compete absolutely and entirely free of charge for the above prizes.

MONSTER PACKET OF CHRISTMAS CARDS,

The South Kensington Fine Art Association Limited,
7 Exhibition Road, South Kensington, London, S.W.

Post Office Orders should be made payable at the General Post Office, London, and crossed for safety, London and South Western Bank Head Office.

Our 63 Page Illustrated Catalogue of Engravings, Photogravures, Frames, etc., Post Free Two Stamps. All letters should be addressed in full:

THE SOUTH KENSINGTON FINE ART ASSOCIATION, LTD.

7 Exhibition Road, South Kensington, London, S.W.

GOOD FELT HAT, Black, Navy, Brown or Grey 2/6. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and made to look smart and yield faithful service.

Model 981.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good value. 10/6

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with gathered front and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths and Prices:

35	38	42	46 in.	Car.
6/11	7/11	8/11	9/11 ea.	6d.

6/11

Lengths are from top of neck band to bottom of skirt in front.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME Model 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of medium weight together with the new Illustrated Dress and Drapery List. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London & Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations.

In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,00 ,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager. Telephone, No. 5 Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 518. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending December 3rd, 1898.

Testing a Coward.

OVER two centuries ago. Fair Virginia, in her most rugged, uncouth state, yet rich in the dignity of an advanced settlement, the favourite ward of England's sovereigns.

The crude fort at Jamestown held a merry garrison, the Governor having impressed upon royalty across the sea the importance of troops in a land where unexpected rebellions against authority might succeed the partially triumphant uprising in 1676.

The commander of the garrison was Colonel Fortune. The number and quality of his troops are not important factors in this tale. Among the men were a dozen or more young subalterns, fresh from England, undergoing their first rough work in the forests of Virginia.

Near the fort were the homes of the officers, the Governor's residence being but a short distance down the rough, winding lane, which was dignified by the name of street. Colonel Fortune's home was the handsomest, the merriest of them all, a typical frontier mansion. A mansion of those days could be little more than a cottage in these, yet the Colonel's was far brighter than the palace of to-day. In his house gathered chivalrous

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

subalterns from English homes and stalwart Virginians of inherited gallantry.

His board was more hospitable than that of the Governor, his favours were coveted even more eagerly than those of his superior. Stern, exacting, yet affable and courteous, he was the idol of a people whose hatred for those who ruled them had wrought ruin more than once.

Mrs. Fortune, a lady of gentle birth, shared the power of her husband.

But there was a colonial queen whose reign was of more consequence to the youth of Jamestown than was that of the august person across the sea. She was queen of hearts, this daughter of theirs, light-hearted Kate Fortune. Daintiest maid in all the land, famed for her wit, her pranks, her loveliness, her dimples and her sunshine, she was the wiliest tempter who ever laid unconscious siege to man's indifference.

The English officers called her an angel, the more deferential Virginians moaned that she was a witch, yet loved her.

In that year, Jamestown was a veritable cauldron of rivals, fair suitors all, some bold, some timid, none hopeful.

Strange as it may appear to those who live these two centuries later, there were no jealousies, no bitterness among them. In those good days the favoured man's best friends were his beaten rivals. Kate's kingdom was not large, but her sceptre was mighty. It was made of tenderness, beauty with discretion, with an occasional shadow of ridicule involved. It was the shadow which her subjects feared more than the rod.

For months the Governor's nephew had been her most ardent admirer, notwithstanding the fact that he had been in Virginia but sixty days. His surrender had been instantaneous.

Ordinarily, the nephew of the Governor, who was a peer of the realm, might be considered a superior rival, but in this instance he was not even feared. He had come to Jamestown with exalted ideas, a haughty demeanour, and what Virginians called a supercilious air. He dressed better, talked better, and lived better, and he seemed to hold every man in the colony at a distance. Friendly, courteous even to the lowest soldier, he still gave the impression that he was condescending, not alone to those beneath, but to those above him. That this man should have drifted to the colonies from the drawing-rooms of London seemed incredible.

Moreover, he had refused to wrestle in the contests at the fort, and had failed to fight the man who had hotly called him a coward in the presence of others.

Tales of his conduct in that and other exhibitions had been spread, and the good-looking young officer was eventually made a laughing-stock. One day, however he pulled the nose of an impudent lieutenant. When the red-faced lieutenant insisted upon satisfaction with swords, he merely turned pale and ignored the challenge.

"I came here to fight the Indians, not to kill my comrades," he had said, and a disdainful laugh followed, bringing a flush to his face as he walked away.

Kate Fortune rather admired the easy elegance of the stranger, yet despised his show of cowardice, the story having come to her promptly enough.

She began to treat him coldly, and he was at last driven to feel that he was her most unwelcome suitor. One day he bluntly asked her why she treated him so unkindly.

"Captain Studford, I will be frank with you," replied the girl. "How can you expect me to admire a man who submits to the ridicule of a whole fort full of men, not one of whom seems able to cope with him in strength or the experience of arms? I am the daughter of an English soldier; that should be sufficient reason for my conduct."

"So I am an object of derision to you, as well as to them," he observed quietly. "I shall not intrude again, Miss Fortune. I am brave enough to tell you for the first time, and in the face of your evident dislike, that I love you better than I ever dreamt I could love a woman."

He was turning away in apparent indifference as he concluded this strange avowal.

Kate planted herself squarely before him, her pretty, perplexed face twitching between a smile and a frown.

"Isn't it cowardly to say that when you know how I feel? You are safe in saying what you already know I could not entertain," she said.

"I would rather not discuss it. You may treat it as a jest, as cowardice, or what you like. I cannot control your treatment of the best thing an honest man has to give a woman."

He left the girl standing upon the tips of her toes in sheer surprise at this extraordinary situation. She was at no time a dignified queen, but she was an inquisitive one.

"But, Captain, you must not go away fearing that I shall treat lightly what you have said to me," she murmured.

"Fearing? Why should I fear your ridicule more than that of others? You are brighter, more bewitching, more tantalising than any woman I have ever known—you are maddening—do you hear? Ah, I crave your pardon for so far forgetting myself as to dwell upon a matter which I should have forgotten in your displeasure.

"By the way, I should like to tell you why I will not accommodate those young fools with a duel, why I have controlled my natural desire to resent their insults.

"I have fought one duel and I have killed a man. These men would have no more chance than that man. You may tell them so. Farewell!"

That same night half-a-dozen young men, with as many maids, dropped in to spend the chilly evening before the Colonel's roaring fires. They were toasting apples, and chatting gaily, when Kate suddenly turned to a young Virginian, and, with taunting eyes, cried:

"Martin Crask, I know why Captain Studford would not fight a duel with you."

"So do I," responded Crask. "Because he feared me."

"'Twas no such reason. He says he does not choose to kill anything but Indians."

A laugh went up from the men.

"The fool! Did he say that to you?" cried Crask.

"He truly did; and, besides, he has fought and killed a man."

"Ho! ho!" laughed Crask disdainfully.

"Did he stab him in the dark?" questioned Farring.

"He lies if he says he fought aught save a boy," sneered Crask.

"Yet he pulled your valiant nose until it was red for near a week," said Kate cheerily.

"Oh, would that I were at him—the coward!" cried Crask, white and trembling.

"You can pull his nose when next you meet him, Martin; it is your turn, you know," said Kate laughingly, and Crask glared at the burning logs in angry silence.

Digitized by Google

"Please forgive me, Martin; I did not mean to hurt you by recalling a previous injury," cried Kate, and Crask's pout grew with her contrition.

"I cannot see why you defend the Captain, Miss Fortune," ventured Farring.

"Why not? He will not defend himself."

"But you surely cannot approve a coward?"

"Are you sure he is a coward?"

"I should consider myself one under the circumstances, I believe," he cried evasively.

"Would it not be cowardly to fight Martin Crask if he knew he could kill him?"

"Bah!" came from the angry Crask.

"He could, at least, have given Crask satisfaction for an insult," said Varney. Kate wavered.

"That's true," she said; "he should have been a gentleman. Still, that does not prove him a coward."

"I'll wager that I can prove him a coward," observed Lieutenant Holmes. "And safely, too."

"'Twere wise to do it safely," supplemented Miss Fortune.

"Once, at home, we exposed a boasting captain, who would have had us think him the bravest man on earth——"

"But that does not seem to be Captain Studford's object," interrupted Kate.

"True," went on Holmes, "but that has nothing to do with it. This captain was one night approached by five of his fellow officers, disguised as highwaymen, and despite his declarations that he had fought dozens of men, he ran like a hound, screaming murder all the way. Why not test your captain's courage as we tested ours, Miss Fortune?"

"In the first place, I could not be a very impressive highwayman, and in the second place he might shoot."

"You have plenty of men at your command who would serve as Indians for such an experiment," speculated Varney.

"We all would!" exclaimed Holmes.

"So you might!" she cried. "He would be willing to kill you if you were Indians."

"We might as well give up the plan, for we could not force him to leave town without a bodyguard," sneered Crask.

"Fie! That is easy. Miss Fortune could ask him to ride with her into the forest, and he would go blindly enough," said Holmes.

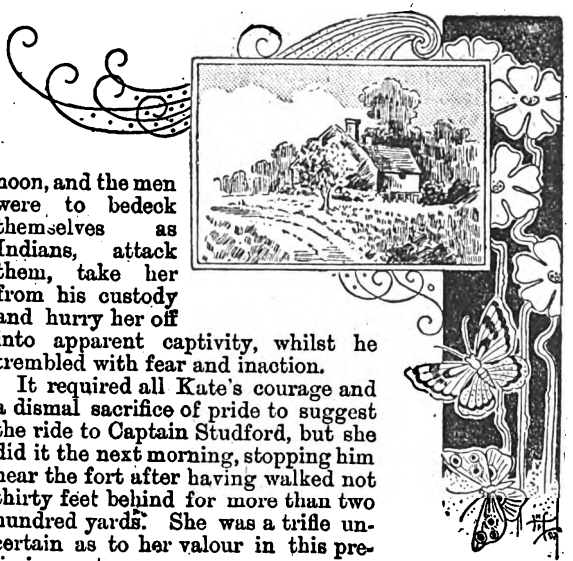
"I?" cried Kate, blushing to think of herself in that position after Studford's declaration. "I could not, would not do such a thing. Prove him a coward, but do not ask me to help you."

"Holmes is right, and Miss Fortune should be willing to make the test. She is his defender; she cannot refuse to satisfy herself of her error in this harmless, yet effective way," announced big Farring, and every member of the party laid siege to Kate's faltering opposition. The fun of it all finally appealed to her, and she rather timidly agreed to the proposition.

But how could she ask him to ride with her after what had passed between them? He would think her unwomanly, and, strangely enough, with that thought she began to feel that she must have his good opinion. Yet she went, half dubiously, into the plot to prove a coward the man she was beginning to admire.

The details of the scheme were submitted by the men, and were as follows:

Kate was to ask him to ride on horseback with her to "Big Fork," five miles through the forest, on some afternoon, and the men were to bedeck themselves as Indians, attack them, take her from his custody and hurry her off into apparent captivity, whilst he trembled with fear and inaction.



It required all Kate's courage and a dismal sacrifice of pride to suggest the ride to Captain Studford, but she did it the next morning, stopping him near the fort after having walked not thirty feet behind for more than two hundred yards. She was a trifle uncertain as to her valour in this preliminary step.

Captain Studford's heart thumped unusually fast as he looked down into the piquant face and blue eyes.

They were very soft and timid this morning—there was something appealing in their tempting depths.

"May I not walk with you? I am going your way," were her first words as she reached his side.

"Whither, pray?"

"Oh, to—" and here she blushed, for in truth she had no destination— "to Anna Corwin's," she concluded in relief.

"But Mistress Corwin lives back yonder. How came you to be going this way?"

"Did I say Anna Corwin?"

"If I am not deaf."

"Then I must have meant someone else; to be sure I did—how foolish of me! I am going to Lucy's. You cannot say, Captain, that she does not live in this direction. I'll not walk with you if you are bound to be particular, though."

"I beg you to forgive me and allow me to walk with you," cried the Captain eagerly.

"I like that much better. No matter if I were going to Anna's and chose a roundabout way, you should not be so impolite as to remonstrate. As a rule, Captain, the men prefer the roundabout way."

"Be it miles, I would walk it with you," cried he, smiling at her merry vanity.

"Oh, would you do that?" she asked, suddenly seeing her way clear. Yet in spite of all, her composure deserted her, and she blurted it out, turning red again. "I am dying to ride to 'Big Fork' to-morrow, but I have no one to accompany me. Would you like to go?" Then to herself: "What a fool he thinks me!"

"Gladly; but are we sure there are no stray Indians about?" he asked rather quickly.

"He is afraid," she thought, with strange disappointment. "If you are afraid, we will not go," she said a trifle coldly.

"Afraid? Not for myself, but for you. We will go if you like, and I should rejoice to meet all the Indians in Virginia if it would please you."

So they made their plans, and she was so loth to leave him that he was forced to remind her that they had passed the house of Lucy Gaines a full furlong or more. He left her at the door, his heart exultant.

Digitized by Google

The next afternoon the two rode forth from Jamestown and into the forest, following the well-made road which led to the westward.

Half an hour previous to their departure, five young men had ridden from the home of Lucy Gaines, strange bundles strapped to their saddles. Above all things, they had cautioned Kate to demand the Captain's proof of marksmanship at a point near Big Fork.

It was with some consternation, notwithstanding all the plotting, that Kate observed the big pistols at the Captain's side and the heavy sword which jangled against his leg. T at jangling sword gave her the tremours, and she cast many furtive glances towards its chain and scabbard. At last she was compelled to ask:

"How can you, I pray, use such a monstrous sword, Captain Stud ord? It must have been made for a giant."

"It was; it was my great-grandfather's over a century ago. See! It is serviceable, even in my hand."

He pulled the gleaming blade, long and heavy, from its scabbard, and swept it downwards through the air so fiercely that it resembled a wide sheet of silver. Kate's blue eyes grew wide with apprehension, a cold chill seized upon her and her ruddy face paled. He returned the weapon to its sheath with such a forceful crash that she started violently in her saddle, her little teeth clicking in sheer fright.

"I could cleave a man's skull in twain as easily as you can cut an apple. Would that we could meet a warlike Indian that I could show how it merits my praise."

"Goodness!" gasped Kate hopelessly. "You would not strike a—a—man with it, would you?"

"If he were an enemy. For you, loved one, I could cut down an army."

Their horses drew more closely side by side, and the fierce, strong hand was gently laid upon her trembling fingers.

Tenderly clasping the little one, the big one raised it until it touched the lips of him who leant across to kiss it.

Their eyes met and he raised his head. His were full of love, hers with a pleading dread, the uncertain quiver between love and fear.

Without a word he dropped the hand, suddenly sick at heart.

"I could die for her, and she despises me," he groaned to himself.

"Oh, what have I—have we done?" she thought, a thousand fears gathering in her heart. "He is no coward, and he will kill one of them! How can I tell him—how can I save their lives? He will despise me! That awful sword! A man's skull! Oh, dear! He called me 'loved one!' How big and strong he is! He called me—how can I keep him from using the sword? The pistols I can manage, and—perhaps they will not be there. He will kill them all—horror upon horror! What have I done? Oh!"

The last exclamation was so loud and so sudden that the pale Captain turned quickly.

"What is it? What is it?"

She laughed wildly, even gleefully, almost in the face of her companion.

"Nothing—nothing at all!" she cried.

"I am glad to have afforded you amusement, Mistress Fortune. You may tear my heart to shreds."

Her manner changed instantly. Tears flew to the blue eyes and her hand crept towards him

"Forgive me, pray, Captain Studford. I—I did not mean to hurt you. I—I—am very foolish, very unkind. You must hate me," she faltered.

"Hate you! How could I? You do not love me—why should I have hoped? I can but blame myself." Her hand had fallen to her side because he had not touched it. "And it is our last afternoon together."

"Last?" she repeated faintly.

"Yes; for I shall not see you again."

"Oh—you—you—do not mean that!"

"I have asked to be transferred to Williamsburg. I—I have not one friend in Jamestown; why should I stay here?" he cried bitterly.

"But you have," she exclaimed eagerly; "you have, I am your friend."

"Friend! That is not what I ask of you," he said almost gruffly.

Silence, broken only by the clatter of the hoofs upon the road, followed his words. In her confusion she had forgotten the terrible sword, but it recurred to her, and with it, the thought which had given birth to her untimely mirth, the thought that was to lead her from the chief predicament into which she had been cast. She would ask the Captain to turn back to Jamestown at once, avoiding the possibility of conflict.

"Captain Studford, I believe we had better turn back." Her face grew crimson beneath his calm gaze.

"As you like. You will grant me time to adjust my saddle girth; it is slipping," he said coolly, dismounting without another word.

They were fully three miles from the village, and in a dense piece of forest. On either side of the narrow road grew the thickest of un erbrush with the great, gaunt trees stretching above like silent sentinels.

A suppressed scream suddenly called the Captain's attention to Kate. Her staring eyes were blinking with consternation.

Deep in the underbrush she had seen the form of an Indian warrior. Horrors! The sword!

"What do you see?" cried he, starting towards the now deserted brush.

"Nothing—nothing!" she gasped. The young men were here instead of at Big Fork! "Yes, I mean that red bird. See? Do shoot it for me—I must have it! Isn't it beautiful?" She was excitedly pointing towards a red bird in the top branches of a big oak.

He drew his pistols and deliberately aimed with one of them. The shot missed, and the bird darted away.

"Oh, goodness!" she cried. "Try the other ones."

"But the bird is gone."

"Is it? So it is—but quick! See if you can cut off that twig up there, the one with three red leaves. I wager you cannot. Quick, and then we will ride home."

"Why are you so excited?"

"I am not the least bit excited—I never am! Why do you not shoot at that twig?"

"You try it," he surprised her by saying, pushing a pistol into her hand.

Without a word and without taking aim she blazed away at the sky and his firearms were useless. She handed the smoking pistol to him with a laugh.

"Would it not be awful if Indians came upon us?" she cried, with strange exultation. "But mount, and race with me to the spring!"

As the Captain placed his foot in the stirrup a yell burst from the thicket, an arrow whizzed above their heads, and half-a-dozen fierce warriors were dashing towards them.

Digitized by Google

"Do not use your sword!" she screamed.

Before the bewildered soldier could catch his breath an ugly brave was in the road, not ten feet away, knife n hand.

Out whizzed the sword!

Kate screamed in agony, clasping her hand over her eyes.

"They are friends! Do not strike!"

But it was too late.

The streak of steel cut through the air. A sickening thud, a gurgling howl, and the assailant fell, his head half severed from his body. An instant later the big Englishman was in his saddle. A second slash and an Indian at his side went down beneath the ancestral blade.

The two horses plunged forward as a brawny redskin grasped her arm, and she felt herself being dragged to the ground. Then, a hand clasped her other arm, a big form leant over behind her, far across the back of her horse. She heard the hiss as of something cutting the air, the crash as of splitting wood, a scream of agony, and the Indian's ruthless grasp was loosened.

Her horse stumbled and seemed to totter beneath her, but again that arm from aloft exerted itself, and it seemed as if she were being lifted to the tree tops. Almost before she could realise it she was upon another horse, clasped in the arms of the rider, and they were off like the wind.

Suddenly she felt the form of the man who held her so closely drop forward with a groan and then straighten again slowly. Exultant yells came from behind them, several arrows whizzed past, and then naught was heard but the thunder of the horses' hoofs upon the frozen ground. As her eyes opened involuntarily, terror possessing them, they fell upon the scene far behind. Two hundred yards away her own horse lay struggling in the road, two human forms stretched near it, another dragging itself to the roadside. Three feathered Indians were some fifty yards nearer, gesticulating wildly.

Her brain whirled and buzzed, and—consciousness was lost.

When she regained her senses she was lying upon the ground. With feeble eyes she glanced wonderingly about. To a tree near by a horse was hitched, beneath her body were the blankets from the horse and certain garments from the back of man.

All was as a dream; she could account for nothing. Studford was leaning against the big oak coatless and as pale as a ghost. Deep lines stretched across his brow and down his mouth; his eyes were closed, as if in pain.

An involuntary moan escaped her lips, and the Captain was at her side almost before it had died away. She was crying:

"Oh, what have I done! What have I done!"

"Calm yourself, dearest! You are safe, entirely so. See, we are alone, far from those fiends. It is bnt a mile to Jamestown. Be brave and we will soon be at home," he murmured hoarsely, kneeling at her side and lifting her to a sitting posture.

"Home! I can never go home! Oh, you do not know—you do not know!"

"There—there! Now be quiet——"

"How could you know? I am the murderess, I am a wretch! Kill me; I cannot live!" she wailed.

"Hush!" he cautioned lovingly.

"You could not know—you did not know them, Captain Studford!" she cried, sitting bolt upright, glaring wildly about her, then shudderingly plunging her white face against his bosom. "They were not Indians," she almost whispered.

"Not Indians!" he gasped.

"Heaven forgive me, no! It was all a trick—to test your courage—forgive me—to test—to test—oh! and I allowed you to kill them! Heaven forgive me!"

"Are you sure, mother?"

"Speak! Go on! What do you mean?"

"They were our friends—not Indians. My dearest friends! Please Heaven let me die!" she wailed.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, after the first bewildering shock. "A trick—and I have killed—oh, it cannot be true!" He leapt to his feet, allowing her to fall from his side to the ground, where she lay, a wretched, shivering heap.

With a ferocious oath he snatched the big sword from the ground and turned upon her, with eyes blazing, muscles quivering.

She was looking up at him, those wide blue eyes gleaming piteously.

"Kill me!" she murmured, and closed her eyes to await the stroke.

His big arm relaxed, the sword fell from his nerveless grasp, clanging to the ground.

When she re-opened her eyes after an age of suspense, she saw him leaning against the tree, his body shaking with sobs. A second glance and she started to her feet alarmed.

His broad back was covered with blood. Near his left shoulder the clothing was torn and an ugly, gaping wound leered at her.

"Oh," she gasped, "you—you are hurt!"

"Hurt!" he groaned. "They have killed me! You have killed me—you and your friends. I hope you are—satisfied—with—your—see?" As he sank to the ground, he pointed feebly to the cruel arrow which he had torn from his side. It lay not far away, grim and bloody.

The horrified girl glanced at it helplessly and then at the unconscious man, unable to realise. Then she cried aloud in her agony and threw herself upon the prostrate form, moaning:

Google

"Dead! Dead! Speak to me, Ralph,—look up! I love you—I worship you! You shall not leave me!"

She kissed the pallid face, caressed the chilling head, sobbing:

"Forgive me—forgive me!"

Shortly afterwards the clatter of hoofs upon the road aroused her from the semi-unconscious condition into which her grief had resolved itself. Through the gathering darkness she saw horsemen approaching—Indian riders! A moment later they were dismounting at her side, and well-known voices were calling to her:

"Are you hurt?"

"What has happened?"

"Killed? Good Heavens!"

It was Farring, Crask and the other plotters, wild with excitement.

Their horses were wet from the fierceness with which they had been ridden.

"Do not touch him! You have killed him!" she cried, striving to shield the body from Farring's anxious touch.

"Killed him? Good Heavens, Kate! Where did you meet them?" cried Farring, as Crask pulled her from Studford's side.

"Are you not dead?" she finally whispered to the men.

"We? He killed three of them—split their heads! But the wretches put an arrow into him, after all. What a dreadful thing we have done. Fairly tricked him to his death!" cried poor Crask.

"Then—then it was not you?" cried Kate.

"Heavens, no! We found the Indians dragging their dead from the road, three miles back, and knew that something terrible had happened."

"Thank Heaven! I am spared that! But he must not die—he shall not! I love him! Do you hear? I love him!"

For three weeks the victim of that ill-fated trick hung between life and death. Surgery was crude in the colonies, and the first evidence of restoration was due more to his rugged constitution than to the skill of his doctor.

The poor fellow rolled and tossed upon one of Mrs. Fortune's soft beds, oblivious to the kind offices of those about him.

They had taken him there at Kate's command, and she had worn herself to a shadow with anguish love and penitence. She watched him by day and by night—in her restless dreams; her whole existence was in the tossing victim of her folly. Every twitch of that pain-stricken body seemed to show that he was shrinking from her in hatred.

Her pretty face was white and drawn, the blue eyes dark and pitiful, the merry mouth plaintive in its tender hopelessness.

And those jovial tricksters—those who had jeered over his lack of courage, the testing of which they had undertaken?

They were haunted by their own shame. The fiery Crask, the polished Farring, the ingenious Holmes, with all Jamestown, prayed for his recovery, and spared no pains to bring to life and health the man who had won that which they had relinquished hope of having—Kate's love. They were tender, sympathetic, helpful—true men and good.

Kate could not forget the look of distrust she had seen upon Studford's face as he stood above her with the great sword in his angry hand.

His first thought was to kill her!

Sitting beside him bathing the fevered brow, caressing the rumpled hair, holding his restless hands, she could feel her heart thumping like lead, so heavy had it grown in the fear of his awakening.

Finally the doctors told her that he would recover, that the fever was broken. Then came the day when he slept, cool and quiet, no trace of fever, no sign of pain.

It was then that Kate forsook him, burying herself in her distant room, guilty and heart-broken, fearing above all things on earth the first repellant glance he would bestow upon her. Once, while he slept, she peered through his door, going back to her room, the swimming tears blinding the plaintive blue eyes.

At last, one day, her mother came from the Captain's room and said to her gently:

"Kate, Captain Studford asks why you do not come to see him. He tells me that for three days he has suffered because you have been so unkind. Go to him, dear; he promises he will not plead his love if it is so distasteful to you!"

Distasteful!

The girl grew faint with wonder, her limbs trembled, her lips parted, her eyes blurred, and her ears roared with the rush of blood from her heart.

"Mother!" she whispered, at last, slightly raising herself from the couch on which she was reclining. "Are you sure, mother?"

"That he wants you? My child, his eyes fill with tears when he thinks of you. I have seen them moisten when he lies looking from the window——"

But Kate was gone.

When Mrs. Fortune opened the door to the sick man's room soon afterwards she drew back quickly, closed it again, and, lifting her eyes aloft, murmured:

"God make them happy!"

Maxwell Brown.

He: "Yes, he called me a 'blooming' idiot."

Him: "As if any one could not see that you had gone to seed."

Young Doctor: "I am doing very well. I was called three nights last week."

Old Doctor: "That's good! I hope you never forget to appear annoyed on such occasions."

Dumbleton: "It's funny about Waverly; on shore he is an ideal of courage and fearlessness—a veritable man of iron; but once aboard a ship at sea, his mettle seems to leave him, and he becomes as timorous as a child."

Flasher: "That's natural enough; you can hardly expect one to be a man of iron when he's aboard."

Contributor: "You didn't use my article?"

Editor: "Was it written on both sides of the sheet?"

Contributor: "Yes, sir."

Editor: "Ah, there is where you blundered. It was promptly consigned to the waste-basket. You must write on but one side, sir."

Contributor (six months later): "My last article hasn't appeared."

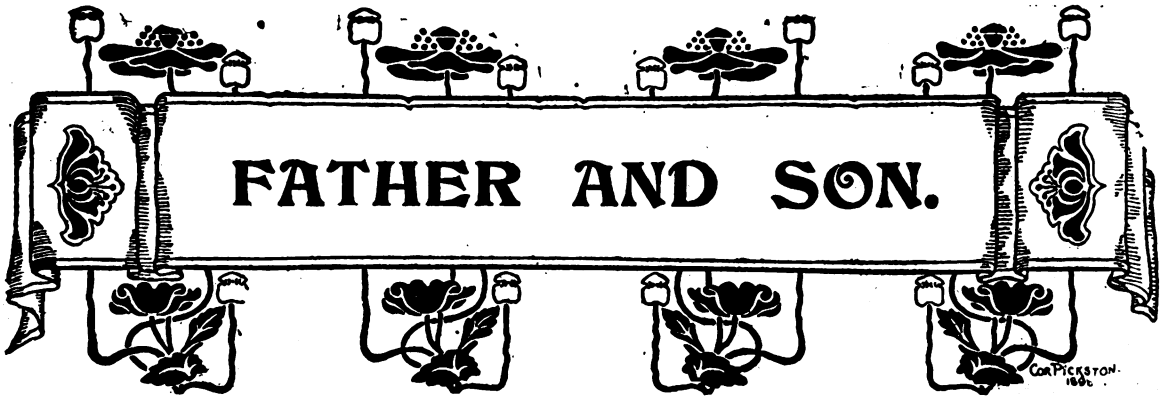
Editor: "Written on both sides of the sheet, was it?"

Contributor: "But on one side, sir."

Editor: "Ah, you were not discreet. I wrote editorials on the other side of it."

Digitized by Google

FATHER AND SON.



It was just six o'clock and nearing the end of September. The old city of Aix-en-Provence wakened lazily. Clothed in white linen, shod in slippers and crowned with a wide-brimmed Panama, M. Roumegas descended to his garden, took up a watering pot, filled it at the pump and began to water his hyacinths, as he did every morning of his life.

With infinite care M. Roumegas watered his hyacinths. One saw plainly that with him it was a serious business, and saw besides that here was not only a man who had nothing else to do, but an old man who had already done much.

Yes, decidedly done much. Few lives had been better filled than his. Till fifty years of age the years had counted double for him. Born in the outskirts of Aix, over there on the edge of the Gardanne, he had gone at fifteen to Marseilles. and gained a few sous by polishing shoes on the Cannebiére, near the Saint Louis racecourse. the clothes on his back, his box, his brushes and blacking, were all he possessed in the world.

Then, how, thirty-five years later, had this poor little bootblack become one of the greatest oil merchants of Provence? How had he been able to retire from business with fortune made and drawing great interest and income from the house created by himself and bearing always his name? By energy, intelligence and probity above all else. Probity! See you, in one word, the great strength of Roumegas, the chief cause of his great success.

One says in a generalising fashion that "honesty is the best policy"—an axiom for rascals that had been constantly put into practice by Roumegas, but without design, one may say spontaneously. It was as easy for him to be honest as for others to be otherwise. He would have died rather than take an unjust advantage, and the recital of an indelicacy put him beside himself; pure as crystal, shining as the sun—such was his reputation. Was there a contest or a dispute to be settled at Aix—M. Roumegas was always the arbiter; advice to be sought—M. Roumegas always the counsellor; a place to be given—M. Roumegas was always the judge to lend the deciding voice.

In the evening, when he went to walk on the Cours, hats were raised to him like flocks of swallows, and the old nobles of the city, so arrogant to people without the distinction of patrician birth, counted it an honour to be the first to salute him. One felt about him an atmosphere of calm and well earned repose. It was a good, honest man that passed.

Such a life merited reward, but Heaven had been unjust to this upright man and had not spared him sorrows. Still young he had lost the wife that he adored, and he remained alone with a babe of six months.

If ever a child was loved by its father, and well brought up besides, it was truly the little Antoine. Roumegas wished to make him not only an honest man like himself, but also an educated man, as he had not been able to be. He had felt the need of it always. It should not be the same with his son.

Oh! the beautiful plans that he made, the poor widower, sitting at his table revising the accounts of the day, between the cradle of the son born to him and the memory of the wife who had died. This little being who slept there so sweetly would one day be his joy and pride. Thanks to him the name of Roumegas, simply honoured to-day, would perhaps become illustrious.

Alas! the father had reckoned without the child. The soil was bad; the flowers sown with so much care did not come up. Not that Antoine was of a naturally vicious disposition—he was indolent, dissipated, weak—weak above all. At college he was the last of his class, which would not be so bad had it mortified him at all; but, unhappily, he lacked self-respect, that two-sided sentiment, sometimes a defect but always a desirable quality. His indolence weighed upon him lightly. It was perfectly useless, it seemed to him, to change his mode of life.

His graduation accomplished with great difficulty, he took up the law, in order to have a show of something; but, his law-reading finished, with more difficulty still, he promised himself cheerfully to do nothing at all.

What good to work? His father was rich, and not everlasting. To the wind with toil and with all save amusement.

And Antoine amused himself, continuing with greater freedom still the unhealthy life of the provincial idler. At the café he smoked perpetually, and ceaselessly swallowed numberless and various concoctions; at the club he played stupidly and heavily, as always, to be doing something. Little by little the fever of play took possession of him, and they were almost certain to find him leaning over the green cloth between three and six in the afternoon, and at night till three or four in the morning.

With other young men of the city, nobles or sons of simple citizens, he sat at baccarat, in the vitiated atmosphere of the club card-room, under the blaze of the gas jets, side by side with Baptistin and Durand, two card-room waiters and out-and-out rascals, who, at hours like these, disdained all form, stretched themselves in the great arm-chairs, joined with polite familiarity in all the phases of the game, encouraging this one, laughing with that one, listening to one and the other, but the boon companions of all.

Digitized by Google

He had recourse to his father.

One night there was a terrible run of ill-luck. The sum lost was heavy. Antoine did not have it. He had recourse to his father, who paid it on condition that he would promise to touch cards no more. Antoine promised. Eight days later he lost again. Fearing to confess the thing to M. Roumegas, whose immovable honesty frightened him, and who would not have been able to "comprehend it," as he said, Antoine borrowed.

Then began for him that fevered life of the gambler, with its alternating luck and ill-luck, its ups and its down, its joys always incomplete, its despairs always profound.

In order to provide funds Antoine played more furiously than ever. Strange as it may seem, luck, hitherto so hard and coy, turned in his favour. He won—won always—won as he wished and all that he wished.

Briefly, at thirty years of age, Antoine was the most absolute, the most complete nonentity it is possible to imagine.

In the city his name was never mentioned without a smile and a shrug of the shoulders; but when they met him in the street, that great, ruddy blonde, with heavy eyes and wearied face, regular featured and handsome, nevertheless, clothed with an elegance too foppish for a gallant of the province, they hesitated to bow to him till they thought of the father, and then the hats were raised. Antoine was saved by the name of Roumegas.

The poor old merchant suffered profoundly. His beautiful dreams of paternal ambition had flown away. He had done all he could to arrest his son on that fatal down-hill slope, but reasoning, threats, nothing that he could do had effect upon that weak and indolent nature. M. Roumegas had thought even of sending him among strangers, but in spite of all he loved devotedly this unworthy son, and he had not been able to decide to part with him.

Wounded in his hopes, his love and his self-respect, poor Roumegas had aged quickly. At seventy years you would have taken him for eighty; under his big straw hat his face appeared as wrinkled as a withered apple; his hair like silver threads, his form, already short, still more contracted, and going from bed to bed in the length of the garden, he was forced at times to rest the "sprinkler" on the ground to ease his weakened hand. He seemed like a little white old doll in the midst of the sunlight and flowers.

* * * * *

A hesitating step crunched on the gravel of the walk, M. Roumegas turned about; Antoine was before him, pale, leaden-tinted, with linen soiled, disordered hair and bloodshot eyes. The old man shrugged his shoulders.

"Ah, you've come!" said he, "and at such an hour! You should be ashamed of yourself! But come, go up to bed and try to be down by twelve o'clock."

With another shrug of the shoulders, full of weariness and resignation, he began again to water his dear hyacinths. Antoine did not stir.

"Father—" began the young man, taking a step forward.

This time Roumegas put down the sprinkler, placed his spectacles on his nose, and in a tone half-vexed, half indulgent, demanded:

"Well, out with it; what is it now?"

"Last night—at the club—" began Antoine, plucking up courage.

"You have played! You have lost again! Ah! misfortune of my life! You will kill me! And your promise to me, too! No matter, you have played; but one thing remains to do—to pay, to pay always, while a sou is mine! It is the honour of the Roumegas! Well, how much is it?"

Antoine was silent still.

"It is not play, then? Then, what is it? A quarrel? You have been insulted? You are going to fight? Ah, these gambling dens! where they smoke, drink, dispute, play, and——"

He stopped suddenly. A terrible thought had flashed into the old man's brain. Trembling, with shaking, supplicating hands, he turned toward his son.

"You—you have cheated?" stammered he.

Antoine's head sunk lower still.

Mon Dieu! It was true, then? His son, he, a Roumegas, was a cheat, a trickster, a thief? The poor father staggered as if struck with a fist.

"Father!" cried Antoine, springing to sustain him.

"Stop, do not touch me!" cried the old man sternly, gasping for breath but still waving him back, "but go, go to your room—your room, I say."

"But, father," cried Antoine, "let me explain a word. I am not as guilty as you think. I have been led away——"

"To your room—to your room!" repeated Roumegas inflexibly.

The son obeyed. Bending his tall form like one condemned, he passed into the house, and up the stairs that led to his chamber. Behind, with head erect, glittering eyes, and short, firm steps, the father ascended with him.

They entered the chamber together—a square, commonplace room, with windows facing the street, in great disorder, and evidently lived in but little. Torn books thrown here and there; and on the walls, hunting guns, swords, and pistols; on all the furniture, chairs, tables, and desks, pipes, pots of tobacco, and cigarettes M. Roumegas closed the door behind him and turned to his son.

"Speak," said he.

Antoine sunk heavily on his unmade bed, and, with eyes on the ground, stifled voice, and nervously twisting an end of the sheet in his feverish fingers, sought to comply.

Digitized by Google

"The first time," said he, "that I asked you for money, I promised to play no more. I had not the strength. I played again. I lost again. I d d not dare to ask you again. I lost, lost always. Then someone proposed to me to go into partnership with him—to play together. We still lost. He, the one that counselled me, prepared the cards, and I—had the weakness to accept. A madness, father; a madness, only! Pardon me!"

Antoine half rose with arms held out to his father.

"Continue," said Roumegas, erect before him, his own arms held crossed, his face set like flint.

"Last night," resumed Antoine, "they had suspicions, and we would have been caught but for me. They know nothing yet—understand, of me, I mean—and if Baptistin does not speak——"

"Baptistin, the club-room waiter, a valet, your accomplice! Unhappy boy, to what depths have you fallen?"

"But they know nothing, nothing as yet, I tell you. Other players in the game are suspected as well as I. Baptistin only is arrested. He will not speak."

"And you would leave him to bear the blame of all? To preserve the little honour that still remains to you, you would escape at the expense of him and others? Know you, Antoine, that this is infamy, nothing more nor less?"

"But father, father, I promise that for the future——"

"The future? You still believe, then, that there is a future for you?"

The sound of footsteps was suddenly heard in the quiet, sunny street. They stopped at the house door. Antoine sprang from the bed, panting for breath. The bell rang. The young man rushed to the window.

"Baptistin has told!" said he, in a strangled whisper, with an ashen face.

M. Roumegas looked in his turn. The Commissaire of Police stood at the door, accompanied by two members of the club, and two police officers. Roumegas let the curtain fall, strode across the wide chamber, took a revolver from the wall, assured himself that it was loaded, and held it to his son, gazing at him now with wide, startled eyes.

"Here," said he, "take it."

Antoine raised his hand mechanically, comprehending nothing. Below stairs the street door had opened. A colloquy was going on between the servant and the arrivals. The muffled sound of the voices was plainly heard in the chamber.

"Since you have lost your own honour," the father continued, "save ours, at least. Come, there is no time to lose."

The colloquy was finished. The steps sounded loud on the stones of the staircase, an old staircase, broad and sonorous as a chapel. They arrived at the door. Antoine shook convulsively.

"Coward!" murmured Roumegas. "Coward to the end!"

And then, still with unfaltering hand, he turned the revolver, aimed at the brow of his son and pulled the trigger.

They knocked at the door. Placing the still smoking weapon by the side of the body, Roumegas threw back the bolt, and pointed to the corpse lying across the bespattered bed.

"Too late, messieurs," said he, "he has done justice to himself."

HARRY SYDNEY.

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 6.

FOUR applicants receive a sovereign each this week. Their names are:

MISS S. YENDOLE, 53 Raymond Street, Dublin.

A. G. POPE, 70 Constance Street, Silvertown, E.

MISS M. L. COLLINS, Trevelyan School, 9 Trevelyan Street, Eccles, Lancs.

J. D. McAra, 57 Pemberton Road, Harringay, N.

Those who did not apply are:

W. J. Roome, 2 Whitehall Buildings, Ann Street, Belfast; Miss M. M. Forse, Englefield Green, Surrey; Mrs. Foulkas, 29 Sandy Road, Seaforth, near Liverpool; A. Sillito, Amington, Tamworth, Staffs; W. Leslie, 1 Paunermill Cottages, Aberdeen; S. Bevan, 8 Stanley Terrace Mount Pleasant, Swansea; J. R. Ibbotson, 18 Portway, West Ham, E.; I. W. Wright, 70 Mildmay Grove, N.; F. Gibbons, Moorland Road, Bournemouth; R. Keddy, 94 Milbourne Street, Carlisle; George Hunt, 24 Hinckley Road, Nuneaton; C. H. Kingdon, 41 Victoria Street, Newport, Barnstaple; Josh Little, Bank Road, Hoylake, Cheshire; R. Pugh, King Street, Oswestry; H. L. Shaw, 2 Saudringham Villas, Ashfield, Ross; M. Bennetts, 95 Bath Street, Ilkeston; W. Hancock, 2 Castle Place, Nottingham; T. E. Smith, 28 Ash Street, Bootle, Liverpool; F. M. Kew, 3 Albert Terrace, Farnborough R.S.O., Kent; C. Kille, 1 The Avenue, Minehead, Somerset; Miss E. Bringloe, 34 Tremlett Grove, Junction Road, N.; W. King, 105 Gaythorne Road, West Bowling, Bradford; J. Jackson, 5 Hanover Place, Coleraine; C. Cornelius, High Street, Killarney; T. Yates, 12 King Street, Leek; David Mills, 93 High Street, Ayr; J. Penlerick, 14 Berkely Place, Falmouth; C. Condy, Endsleigh Place, St. Mary Church; B. Isaacs, 41 Beaufort Street, Builth; J. Blunt, Aylesbury Street, Fenny Stratford; J. Donald, 74 Palace Road, Streatham; Rev. J. C. Brown, 37 Market Street, Haddington; Percival Owen, 98 High Street, Thame; F. Sharpe, 9 Waller Street, Luton; Mrs. Barber, 66 Midland Road, Wellingborough; J. Bloxham, 28 Main Street, Oldham; T. Worth, 27 Market Street, Stalybridge; John Young, 24 Marshall Place, Perth; D. H. Brown, 8 Lower Meyrick Street, Pembroke Dock; A. Blenkinsop, 13 Exmouth Street, Leeds; H. S. Hill, Western Morning News Office, Plymouth; D. Harrison, 52 London Road, Stoke-on-Trent; J. Ray, 34 Brewery Street, Kate's Hill, Dudley; J. Abel, High Street, Lye, Stourbridge; H. Barker, 1 Clarence Road, Croydon; W. H. Barnett, Market Place, Oakham.

A NEW SERIAL

ENTITLED

SANDY CARMICHAEL

Will begin in the Christmas Number of

. . Short Stories. . .

IT IS BY C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE,

Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle" in PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Digitized by Google

CAP AND GLOVES.

"Oh, yes! And I forgot to tell you. You know your old flame is to be married in a few weeks?"

"Is she? Which?"

"You had a good many, hadn't you? Well, guess!"

"Let me see. Madeline Pierce. Oh, you tell me, sis! I'm too tired to guess. That train has shaken me all to pieces in the last fifty miles."

"Well, then, if you're too tired to exert your mind—Edith Barton."

"Oh! And she marries—?"

"Bob Bristol, of all men. Old enough to be her father, isn't he?"

Cortrell had been away five years in Scotland, and was spending his first long holiday at home with his mother and sister. He had come back, it seemed to him, much more than five years older. There was upon him now the steadying pressure of great responsibilities, for he was now a prominent official in a large business enterprise.

All that he saw—even the faces of his mother and sister—reminded him of what he had been, and he found himself, as he stretched at full length on the couch, wondering how he could ever have been so frivolous, and so joyously careless of consequences in everything, as he had been in the days that now seemed to him to belong to the dim distance of history.

"So women can forget sometimes, you see," said his sister, continuing her talk.

Bob's thoughts were wandering back to the past. Presently he exclaimed somewhat suddenly:

"By jingo, Clara, I believe I have something! Let me see. When do you say Edith is to be married?"

"In about five weeks, I believe."

"I wonder whether I ought to take it to her, or send it?"

"Send what? Wedding present?"

"Eh? Yes, of course, I must send a wedding present. I knew Bristol quite well. He's an older man than I am, isn't he?"

That evening Charles Cortrell unpacked a big leather trunk in the privacy of his own room. He took out a tin box that looked as if it had been designed originally to hold cash. He unlocked the box and took out package after package. Last of all, right at the bottom, was some tissue paper, and neatly folded in the tissue paper were a pair of very much faded kid gloves.

Cortrell took out the tissue paper package, replaced the various bundles, locked the tin box, and sat down to think.

He laid the faded gloves on a little writing table before him, drew up a chair, rested his elbows on the table, and supported his head on his two hands. As the faint odour of the gloves came to his nostrils, a smile, half of amusement, half of tenderness, played over his face.

"But the question is, how am I to do it?" he said aloud to himself after some minutes of brooding.

The smile on his face grew more and more tender. Presently he sighed, and then spoke again to himself.

"That has nothing to do with it now, old man. That was long ago. Yes, you can't keep these things now. You've got to do it."

Edith Barton certainly had been a little disconcerted when the news came to her that her sweetheart of five years before had suddenly made his appearance in the town just at the time when her engagement to Bristol had been made public.

She was not vividly conscious of any feeling for Charles Cortrell that could have been construed as disloyalty to her fiancé, but she knew only too well how recklessly tongues will wag in a small town, where each man's—or woman's—business is the business of all, and, considering many things, Cortrell's sudden appearance just then, after a continuous absence of five years, might very plausibly be made to bear a significance that would disturb the smooth surface of her engagement. There had been rumours that Mrs. and Miss Cortrell would, some time or other, go North to make their home with Charlie, but no one had expected to see him back in his former home.

Edith sat before the fire two days after Cortrell's arrival, and was meditating over these things, when Cortrell himself was announced. She was looking for a visit, not from him, but from Bob Bristol. Nevertheless she found little or no difficulty in meeting him with conventional care.

At first, that is. Her old friend—or sweetheart—lost but little time in coming to the particular business of his call, and it certainly startled her a little when he said:

"I am very glad I found you alone."

Digitized by Google

"Glad?" she said. "Oh, yes. It is nice to be able to have a little chat. Tell me about what you have been doing up there."

"I can tell you about that at some other time," said Cortrell. "Just at present I have to discharge a duty. Oh, yes. It wouldn't be right. At least, I wouldn't like it, if I were in Bristol's place."

"Like what?" said the girl.

"This!" And he took a tissue paper packet from his pocket.

Edith opened the packet, wondering. When she saw the old gloves lying there, with the marks of wear of many years ago upon them, but also marked with the folds of many other—later—years of careful keeping, a whole procession of memories passed before her mind. She was silent for some moments.

"What ought I to do with them?" she asked. "I don't know. Tell me."

Not the least doubt of it, the whole affair was excessively silly. It was thoroughly in keeping with the rest that now this young woman, on the eve of marriage with another man—a marriage into which no one had forced her—should be looking with pitiful appeal in her eyes and with tears, at a man who had flirted with her five years before. Still, silly as it was, it was so.

Cortrell, on his part, looked extremely uncomfortable. He may have been wishing that he had sent the old gloves by post, or by messenger; but then again he may not have been altogether sorry to see that appealing look and those swimming eyes.

"I—I don't know," he stammered. "Perhaps I ought not to have brought them. But I don't see why not. I don't see how I could have kept them, could I?"

"You might have burnt them, mightn't you?" Edith said, with a rather mischievous smile.

"So I might," Cortrell answered quickly. "I give you my word, Miss Barton—I beg you to believe me—I never thought of that."

The manifest sincerity with which this was said and the ingenuous blush that accompanied the explanation were irresistible. Edith burst into a hearty laugh, which Cortrell was not long in taking up. But at that moment the street door was opened, and then the door of the room, where these two stood laughing over an old pair of gloves, and the servant girl, in her directed and distinctive manner, announced, "Mr. Bristol."

There was nothing really embarrassing in the situation; the embarrassment was only apparent. The event might have been different if all the persons concerned had looked at the case as it should have been looked at. But while the girl, with characteristic candour, saw only the reality, Cortrell was, for some reason, impressed chiefly by the appearance. Bristol, perhaps naturally, reflected Cortrell's view.

He at once walked to the table and, lifting the gloves, said, with eyebrows raised, "A present? Won't you let me into your joke?"

"How are you, Bristol?" Cortrell said, holding out his hand. "I hope you haven't forgotten me."

The worst of it was that Edith was still laughing. And there were the gloves. Bristol appeared to think that the situation demanded a display of quiet dignity.

"I remember you perfectly, Mr. Cortrell," he said, bowing slightly. "May I ask again what amuses you so much?"

Edith became serious in a moment, and, as she became serious she became angry.

"It isn't very much of a joke, Bob," she said. "If you insist on having it, however, Mr. Cortrell has just found an old pair of gloves of mine and has brought them to me, because it didn't occur to him to put them in the fire. Isn't it funny?"

"I hardly think so," Bristol answered. "Perhaps I might appreciate the joke better if I knew where Mr. Cortrell found these gloves."

As Cortrell opened his mouth to make some answer to him, Edith, putting up her hand, said:

"This is my business. I'm afraid you will not have an opportunity of fully appreciating the joke, Mr. Bristol, until you manage to get yourself into a better humour for that sort of thing."

She very carefully folded up the gloves and laid them behind the clock on the mantelpiece, while Cortrell stared at her and Bristol stood biting his nether lip.

Then there was an awkward pause for some moments, until Cortrell said something about going.

"Why, I've hardly had ten words with you yet, Mr. Cortrell," Edith said, with a wicked glance at the other man. "Please don't go yet. Perhaps—perhaps I may find something of interest to show you, if you'll wait a little longer."

"Then perhaps I had better call at some other time," Bristol said.

It was a very awkward situation indeed. Bristol could not stay after this last observation of his, and Cortrell could not run away after Edith's pressing invitation.

Half an hour later Cortrell said:

"What did you mean by saying that you might find something interesting to show me?"

"Did I?" said Edith. "Do you hold me to it? It occurred to me suddenly. Wait here.

"Do you recognise this?" And she suddenly produced an old faded red velvet smoking cap, with sides pulled down and an absurd brush at one side.

"By Jove!" Cortrell exclaimed.

"Yes," said Edith. "You had to go home bareheaded."

"It was that night, wasn't it, after we had all been to the mill—"

"Remember the water rats?"

"And you would pull off your gloves and try to reach water lilies."

Edith nodded. "And you wouldn't give them back to me."

"Jack stole my cap, didn't he?"

"Yes, and I made him give it to me—to keep in pledge for my gloves."

"When did you find that old cap, Miss Barton?"

"About a week ago," Edith said, looking a little confused. "I didn't know you were coming home then."

"Of course you were going to send it to me?"

"Of course I was."

"By the way, didn't it occur to you to burn it?"

They both burst out laughing once more.

As for the story that Bristol and Cortrell had high words after that, and that mutual friends with difficulty prevented them from fighting a duel, there never was anything in it. Bristol was a sensible man at bottom, even though irascible at times. He made some sort of an apology to Edith Barton for his exhibition of temper.

But the Bristol-Barton wedding was postponed in a quiet way. It never came off. The Cortrell-Barton wedding came off instead, though not until a year after the incident of the cap and gloves.

E. Fairfax.

Digitized by Google

THE PACKAGE OF GEMS.

He had been a friend of my boyhood—one of many. I had not seen him for twenty years, but the day I saw him last had been as yesterday always, I remembered him so distinctly.

He was handsome and loved the things I loved, including a pretty girl who had gone her own way, in spite of us, long, long ago. I made a point of finding him when I came to London.

"You must come home with me to-night," he said. "I am living alone this summer, and we can have a long talk."

I went home with him gladly, and was surprised at the plain way of living he had cut out for himself. He took me to a little flat and cooked his dinner and mine, and served it with his own hands. He had been a bit reckless at college, and along with high honours had carried off a reputation for extravagance that had had its influence on local prophecy.

"I'm leading a simple sort of life," said he as he passed the coffee. "Prodigality is one of the great sins of our generation—great because it is the father of so much evil. Many of the people in great houses in the West End are living on money that doesn't belong to them. They're living a lie, an imposture. I know what it is, for in a small way I've had my share of it. I've come at last to being just what I am, without fear, without shame—a poor devil who works for his living. I have no worry over debts and no fear of to-morrow."

"You surprise me, Jack," I said. "You once had the habit of spending, I remember."

"I know, I know," he said as he lit a cigar, "and it took me into the fire. It's a long story and I don't mind telling you, as we've gone so far, if you care to listen."

Assured of my interest he began his story.

"I married soon after coming here and went to live in a good neighbourhood. Was with a diamond importer, had a fair salary and remarkable success in my line. My work was to look after local dealers, and hard work it was, for I had to keep them coming continually to look at our stock.

"We had a large house. My wife was attractive and popular, and we had a lot of company and went about a good deal. Of course, I can talk to you frankly, Ned. We went the pace, and I found that we were spending more than I was earning.

"It wasn't my wife's fault, she would have put up with little. But I was proud of her and she was fond of dress. I gave her no word of warning or hint of my trouble.

"Well, the dogs of debt were after me in due time, a big pack of them, baying like hounds on the track of the quarry. I put on a cheerful face at home and cut my own expenses to the last farthing for the sake of my family; gave up cigars and billiards and all that. To be sure, my family should have come down to plainer living. I should have seen the breakers ahead and turned into smooth water. I thought of it night and day, but I couldn't see my way to doing the right thing. I tell you it's hard to turn back when those you love must suffer for it, walking down with you to the lowlands of humiliation.

"To sum it up, I thought of them and it made a coward of me. I kept on hoping and planning and praying for some bit of good fortune to help me out of my trouble. My eldest daughter—poor girl! she's dead now—had a fine voice. She would have made a prima donna, everybody said that. She should have had a thorough training in music. I tried to find a way to it.

"Every day of my life I was tortured by that problem, and I lay awake at night thinking and planning. I was sure that a couple of hundred pounds invested for that purpose would bring back a fortune. My wife and I had a long talk about it one evening—the frankest talk we had had about money. She planned how she could cut her expenses every week enough to pay for the lesson.

"It worked for a while, but my creditors were closing in on me, and it took more to keep them off my back. The small saving we had made by cutting down expenses, and more, was swallowed up by my new obligations.

"Then it seemed to me that I had robbed Peter to pay Paul, and had added my family to my list of creditors.

"My career had come near a crisis one day. I had to take some money home with me—a good bit of it. The rent had not been paid for six months; I owed the music teacher, the butcher and the baker as much as they would stand; I had fifteen shillings in my pocket. I was near a sharp turn.

"It was midwinter. The darkness had fallen early, and everybody had left the office but me. We had been taking an inventory of stock, and I had more stuff to handle than any of the others. In a drawer of my safe there was a package of 'sorts,' as they call them—stones that were off colour and imperfect. It had lain there for years, and I had handled it a hundred times.

"I had opened this package and counted the stones, and was folding it when I heard the latch of the door rattle. I stopped and looked about me. Nobody had opened the door; I could hear no sound in the shop. My heart was going like a sledge-hammer. Of a sudden I heard a whisper.

"'A good idea!' it said.

"I jumped as if one had pricked me deep. Heavens! those words had come out of my own mouth. I leant over on the desk in front of me and an awful horror came into my heart. The tears came into my eyes, but in a moment I had pulled myself together. Then I heard that whisper again.

"'Fool!' it said, 'you're no thief. You will put them back in a little while—within a year, anyhow.'"

My friend had whispered these words hoarsely, and then he sat still a moment looking down. He nervously took a sip of water.

"I don't know that I ought to tell you all this," he went on presently. "Somehow I like to tell it, and I've gone so far that I must finish."

"No matter what comes," I said, "I shall think none the less of you, Jack."

"Well," he said, "I put the package in my pocket, walked out, and secured a loan on the gems.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I took a late train home, and I had the money I needed—about two hundred pounds. At the station I met my butcher and paid him. That was an unfortunate thing; I was up to my neck in it then.

"As soon as I had done it the devil left me. There came no other word of hope or encouragement. I was a fearful creature all at once, afraid to go home and face my wife.

"She was waiting for me when I came in. It was near eleven o'clock, and they were all in bed but she.

"'What's the matter, dear?' she whispered when I entered the bedroom and sank into a chair. 'You are pale and you stagger. What is the matter?'

"'Headache!' I answered, lying back in the chair and closing my eyes. 'Just one of my headaches.'

"'I've had an awful evening,' said she, bathing my head with eau de cologne. 'I've been thinking about you for some reason. I'm sure we've been living too expensively. Don't you think so, dear? I wish you'd talk with me about those things. I'm afraid I've been very thoughtless all my life. We'd better give up the house and go into a little flat. I shall be just as contented and happy as I am here, and you'll have less worry.'

"She knelt beside me and put her arms about my neck, and I was near breaking down.

"'Too tired to talk,' I whispered, 'turn down the light; it hurts my eyes.'

"I felt as if I were on the brink of a precipice, and thought the darkness would hide my peril from me. Every caress of my wife hurt me like the blow of a whip.

"What a relief at last when the darkness of the night covered me in my own bed!

"'I know what I shall do,' I said to myself, 'I can borrow that money off somebody and go and get the package.'

"'You're in trouble,' whispered my wife tenderly the next morning. 'Tell me what it is.'

"I made no answer for a moment, and suddenly I saw a little of God's purpose in making good women.

"'I'm a thief, dear—a thief,' I whispered.

"'You're crazy! My husband is no thief,' she answered proudly, and facing me as she would a slanderer.

"Well, Ned, I knew what a woman's love can do and suffer that morning; what it is to have a wife who is a true helpmate. I told her everything—laid my heart bare.

"'Put on your coat;' said she when I had finished. 'We must go at once and see Fordham and give him that money and tell him the whole truth—we must go.'

"We went away in the early morning. Neither of us spoke, but both were thinking the same thoughts, I suppose, and we walked as one person.

"It was still early when we came to the house of Mr. Fordham. He was the head of the firm. We rang the bell.

"I shall not try to tell you all that happened after they let us in. It is too painful. Men are apt to be hard on a fellow who's down.

"Fordham was that kind of a man. He had no pity for either of us, and I went to the police station that morning.

"I shall never forget the face of the magistrate the morning I came into the court. He'd some good mercy in him.

"'What have you to say?' he inquired.

"'Nothing,' I answered, 'except that I am guilty.'

"'Have you consulted a solicitor?'

"'No, sir,' I answered; 'I have no defence to make.

"'I shall not accept the plea,' he said.

"'Tell me about it—tell me everything,' he continued.

"When I had finished he turned his face away and sat thinking a moment.

"Then he sentenced me to one day's imprisonment, so I was free that same afternoon."

My friend rose and went and stood by the window in silence.

"It's a humble home," said he, coming back presently to sit by me, "but we're very happy here. My wife and daughter will return to-morrow, and I want you to stay and meet them." J. Ervine.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 9 distribution must reach us by December 5th, addressed to The 9th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Sixth Distribution appears on page 713.

Digitized by Google

OLD RELIABLE.

Big, burly, good-natured Jack Woodford, the most popular engine driver on the line, ran the Limited Express eight years and eleven months.

Ordinarily a modest man, Jack was proud of his family and his railway record. Having married late in life, his family was small, consisting of a wife—a little woman, who led him by despotic power of pure love and faithful devotion—and two toddlers—Jimmy, aged five, and Sallie, a midget of three.

His record was absolutely clear; to acquire and retain such a record requires constant care and quick wit in emergencies.

Realising his position, Jack prized it highly. The time schedule was frequently shortened to meet the competition of opposing lines, and, with increasing business, the train became so heavy that to make time with it became a problem. One after another, engine-drivers were appointed to run in opposition to Jack, but, with discouraging regularity, they were removed for inability to make the time. Jack alone remained.

You are not to understand that during all those years his train had arrived at, and departed from, all stations with chronometric accuracy. That, indeed, would verge on the impossible.

There is a limited amount of time that may be lost without censure, and it was in accomplishing this feat with the Limited, in spite of the drawbacks, that Jack Woodford had established a record.

One perfect June day Jack's engine stood at the head of her train, the incarnation of latent power. The gentle regular puffing of the air pump exhaust gave her the appearance of enjoying a quiet smoke while waiting. She glistened and shimmered in the sun with a profusion of polished metal.

Jack was ready, his left hand grasping the throttle lever, and his head turned, watching the conductor for the signal to go. He had inspected her thoroughly, and had assured himself that everything was right, yet he was uneasy.

The recent heavy rains had fouled the water in the tanks along the road, causing it to foam in the boiler—nothing very serious or unusual on a locomotive, but there was no time to bother with foaming boilers on the Limited—no time for anything but to run at the very highest speed obtainable. Both Jack and his partner had reported "Boiler washed" on their last two trips, but, being a week ahead of her regular wash-out day, the foreman had not chosen to disorganise the routine of his work to accommodate a couple of men.

Jack might have reported him, but that wasn't his way, and, besides, he had promised to wash her out next journey, for certain.

The last passenger entered, the guard waved a signal to Jack; there was a hissing and spitting from cylinder cocks, and she was off.

Before he got clear of the station, Jack eyed the cocks uneasily—something was unsatisfactory beyond a doubt, he felt it.

But he gave the usual wave of the hand to the little group in the garden of his cottage just outside the town. There was an answering flutter of handkerchiefs, and the wife and babies gazed wistfully for a moment, their faces illumined with a light not due to the June sunshine, at the disappearing dust cloud left by the train at the curve.

The engine commenced working water at the first heavy grade, and Jack lost a minute. After that the fireman could count the mile-posts by the nervous snapping of Jack's watch-case. By taking water at a certain tank he could go in without stopping for water again, otherwise he would have to make two water stops, but it was there that he got the bad water on the last run, and it had caused him worry enough.

* * * * *

He had learnt that the water was about all alike on the road, but he determined, nevertheless, to make the two water stops; it might be a little better in the other tanks. He regained ten seconds of the lost time before reaching the water-plug.

Admonishing the fireman to hurry, he jumped down and oiled, finding, to his great relief, all bearings stone cold. In spite of their haste, he left here a minute and a half late, and she behaved so badly that he arrived at the next station two minutes behind time.

He was only half way yet, and the prospect was pretty blue. The next station was a junction from which three engines ran on a branch out to some coal-mines. One of them would be there when he arrived. He telegraphed ahead to have her ready for him, his engine being disabled.

His guard and an old friend, Phil Howard, as well as every regular traveller in the train, knew that Jack's record was in danger at last.

As the train pulled up at the station, all hands were ready to assist in uncoupling the engine. But in the midst of the hurry Howard called to him:

"Ah! Here's a funeral to go."

While the casket was being got on board, the station-master handed Jack a message which read: "No engine here. Have forwarded your message to Leyland."

* * * * *

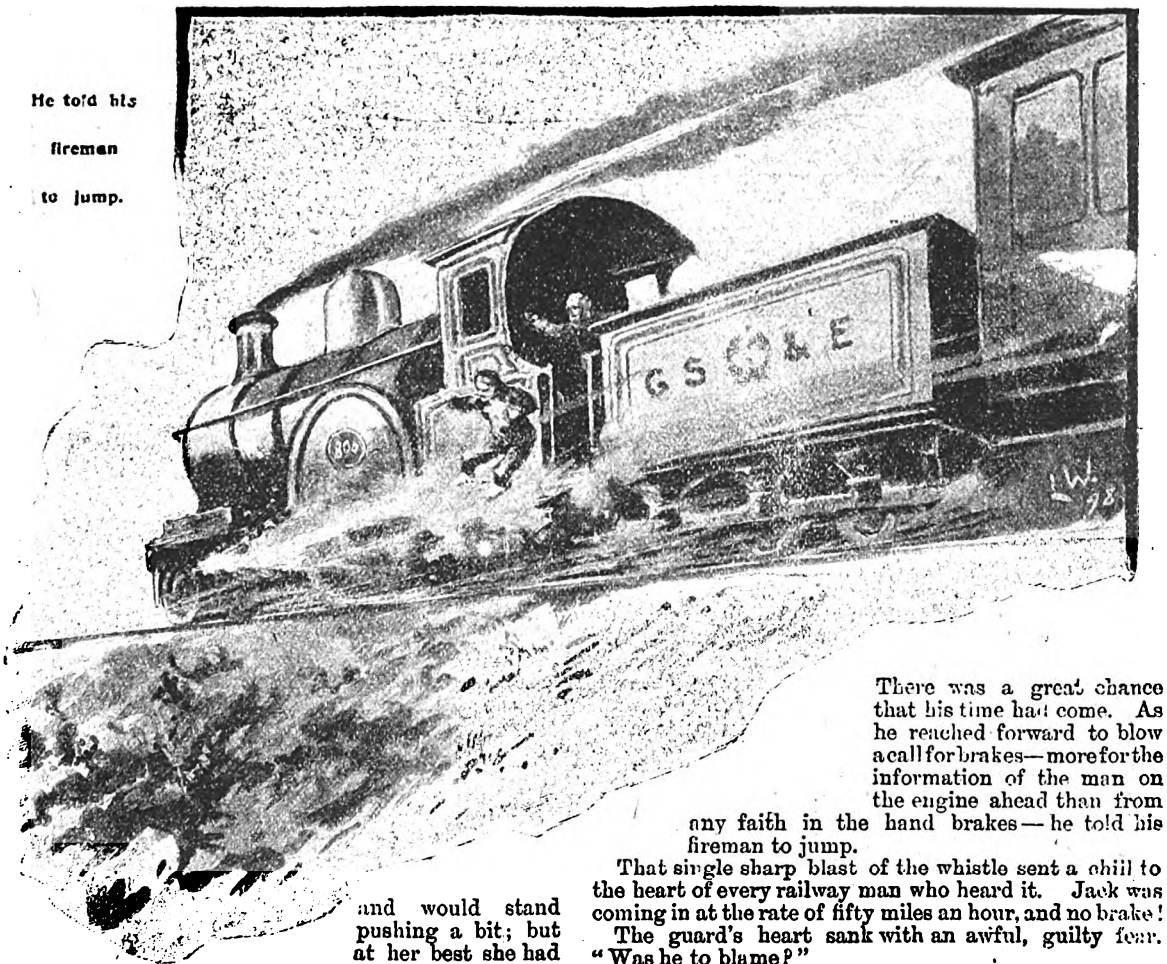
Leyland had been the junction at one time. There were large sheds there, and several engines. The deferential care with which a casket must be handled caused them to leave that station three full minutes late—the limit. Neither Jack nor Howard knew that the other guard had uncoupled the air-hose, and in the bustle at the station, that worthy had forgotten to couple it again. So Jack pulled out with no brakes on the train, and determined not to lose any more time if it was possible to avoid it.

The shed foreman at Leyland received an order to have an engine ready to take the train on its arrival. She was due in twenty-five minutes, and, wondering what could have happened to "Old Reliable," as Jack was popularly called, he got his whole force on the work. Within five minutes of the train's arriving time he had an engine coaled, watered, and ready to start, standing on the main track just beyond the station. It was a good job, well and quickly done.

Jack would cut the "87" off, run up behind the extra engine, and back in on the siding. The man in charge of the extra engine would back down alongside, Jack and his fireman would move their things to her and back on to the train. The whole manœuvre would be carried out while the passengers and luggage were getting off and on, without losing any time.

After leaving W———, the "87" behaved a little better; she had thrown out much of the offending matter,

Digitized by Google



He told his fireman to jump.

and would stand pushing a bit; but at her best she had never made up quite a minute between there and Leyland—and she was far from being at her best now.

Jack took advantage of every little point in the line, and worked all he could to swing her along. She would gain a few seconds here, and drop them again there; it was a close, hard fight—one that many men would have given up in despair, but he stayed right with her to the end.

When he reached the summit of the hill from which he could look down into Leyland, a mile away, he knew he would arrive there only two and a half minutes late—technically in time. He knew to an inch how far he could use steam, and it was with a sigh of relief that he shut her off and dropped the lever down. He blew for the station, glanced curiously at the air-brake gauge—which showed the proper pressure—and leant wearily over the side with his hand on the brake-valve.

As the train rolled rapidly down the grade, he applied the brake-gently, to slow it up. He felt at once that it had no hold. He glanced in alarm at the gauge, and turned the valve all the way round. The truth flashed over him with a paralysing chill. He had no brake!

He set his teeth grimly, and the grey eyes flashed with determination as he swung his great weight on the reverse lever and turned her over into the back motion.

There was a great chance that his time had come. As he reached forward to blow a call for brakes—more for the information of the man on the engine ahead than from any faith in the hand brakes—he told his fireman to jump.

That single sharp blast of the whistle sent a chill to the heart of every railway man who heard it. Jack was coming in at the rate of fifty miles an hour, and no brake!

The guard's heart sank with an awful, guilty fear. "Was he to blame?"

The stoker leapt from the extra engine and ran half way across the yard. The signalman showed a blanched face at his window, and tried to think whether he had made a mistake.

Phil Howard, the veteran, understood his friend's wild appeal for help. Regardless of probable consequences, he jumped to a brake-wheel. But the onward rush of ten heavy express carriages was not to be checked by a single hand-brake.

With a crash and a roar, "87" ran her nose under the other engine's tender; she threw it, crumpled and battered, clear over its own boiler. The spare engine shot ahead, but again "87," her drivers sliding, was driven into her like a ram.

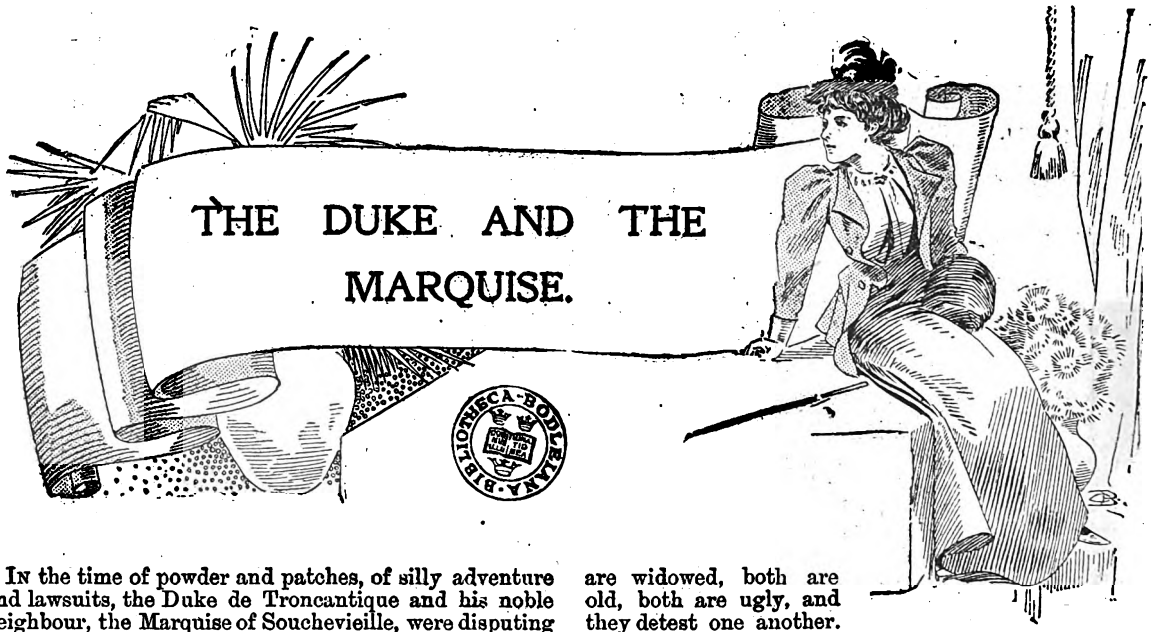
This time Jack's engine was derailed, and, as she ploughed into the ties, the force from behind slued her round, and turned her over on top of him.

* * * * *

The radiant light has gone from the eyes of the widow and her orphans; but it is one of the valued traditions of the line to this day that Jack Woodford was the only man who never lost time with the Limited.

H. E. HAMBLEN.

Digitized by Google



THE DUKE AND THE MARQUISE.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

In the time of powder and patches, of silly adventure and lawsuits, the Duke de Troncantique and his noble neighbour, the Marquise of Souchevieille, were disputing hotly over the possession of a certain hazel copse.

Which of the two belligerents had the best of it? A difficult problem, truly. Perhaps the Marquise—perhaps the Duke. The misanthrope Rochefoucauld has said that a quarrel can never last long unless there is wrong on at least one side. The dispute of the Duke and Marquise kept up seven years.

While the most illegible scrawls poured in without cessation upon the two châteaux, the two owners experienced an equal uneasiness as to the issue of their suit. To be sure, the decision of the tribunal could not cause great pecuniary loss to the vanquished, but since the "amour-propre" of each was involved, the rancour of the two disputants would have been quite as great with only a pin at stake. Indeed, so carried away did both become, with the fear of losing, as well as with the hope of winning, that they finally bethought them of a compromise.

One fine day the Duke de Troncantique (feigning, out of kindness of heart, to come to terms), solicited the hand of the Marquise in marriage, and she, pretending to be overcome by such graciousness, condescended to grant his request. Thus the hazel copse was to be owned by them conjointly.

The betrothal, hastily announced, set everybody agog both far and near, who had heard of the tiresome litigation.

The gentlemen of the law turned their backs upon them in disgust.

"Poor creatures," they said apologetically, "the idea of marrying to end a quarrel! It is as senseless as the crazy man who jumped in the river for the fear of getting damp."

The families of the Duke and the Marquise shrugged their shoulders, and cried:

"A lawsuit is more expensive than one would suppose."

But the world at large applauded the arrangement, and declared it most reasonable.

"They both," remarked the Countess de Languefine, "bear aristocratic names, and own fine fortunes. Both are widowed, both are old, both are ugly, and they detest one another. What more could one demand in a matrimonial venture?"

As to the bride and groom-elect they paid small heed to the gossips, contenting themselves with deploring the exigencies of fate, and retarding as much as possible the fulfilment of their mutual promise.

The gallant lover pleaded business in the city, and his fiancée pretended to have urgent duties in the country.

For the sake of the proprieties they agreed to write to each other while thus separated.

The Duke took refuge in a suburban hotel.

Seated upon a Louis XIII. chair, and looking almost imposing, with his white hair and amaranthine coat framed by the sombre tapestries on the walls, he absent-mindedly broke the seal of a letter bearing a coat of arms, which he had just received.

Glancing at the feminine handwriting covering the pages he remarked, smiling:

"Some work for you, my nephew Cleante."

Cleante was standing in the embrasure of the leaded glass window.

His twenty years, his eyes of periwinkle blue, his blonde hair, frosted with powder, and his violet doublet quilted with lace, brightened the old room. He was as piquant and catchy as a madrigal—as young and fresh as the springtime.

He seemed to have been created for the pencil of La Tour, or the pen of Marivaux.

"How my worthy friend would turn up her aristocratic nose if she knew how I disposed of her epistolary efforts," added Monsieur de Troncantique, fanning himself with his Mechlin lace handkerchief, while Cleante took the letter of the Marchioness, and read it over carefully, in order to acquaint himself with its contents.

It was so full of vivacity and sparkle, that one felt sure the heart of Madame de Souchevieille was still young even though her face was seamed with wrinkles. She wrote of serious things without pedantry, and amusing ones without frivolity.

Digitized by Google

Here and there was a hint of philosophy, and occasionally one of politics. Indeed, it was charming, this letter, written scarcely a century after Mme. de Sevigne, at a period when Mme. d'Epinay, Mme. du Deffand, and so many others conversed with their pens, like Voltaire and Diderot.

Cleante read each paragraph eagerly, inhaling at the same time the fragrance of the rose-tinted paper. And what images this subtle perfume evoked—a white hand, a rebellious little curl, a lace fichu crossed modestly over a young and palpitating breast. If he had only not known to a certainty that the writer was a grey-haired woman of sixty! The young man smiled to himself.

"Is it possible that I am becoming enamoured of a person of that age?" he queried.

"Well, nephew," demanded the Duke, awakening from a short nap, "is the Marquise as loquacious as usual? If you will reply to her letters for me, in my name, you will render me a service I cannot soon forget. Would to Heaven that you could permanently fill my place there!"

At the château of Souchevieille the Marquise reclined in an easy chair, surrounded by dainty trifles, and read the New Heloïse from time to time, having recourse to her enamelled snuff-box.

A few steps from her a young girl was busy writing at a rosewood desk. She worked rapidly, punctuating the phrases with graceful movements of the head, as though admiring the delicate black characters which, without speaking, expressed so much.

She was a graceful girl of sixteen, and her lithe young figure looked even more graceful than its wont, emerging from the voluminous paniers of her brocaded gown, while the velvet about her neck, and the patch upon her chin and under her left eye appeared indescribably black against her milk-white skin.

"In the name of Heaven, Doris, my child, how do you find so much to say to the Duke?" lazily demanded the old lady.

"Ah, aunt, dear, I have not yet written half as much as he wrote to you," replied Doris, with a smile. "The Duke must indeed be passionately in love with you to pen such pretty speeches, and I believe—yes, I really believe, that you will be happy with him. Such sentiments bespeak a bright mind and noble heart."

"The heart of a bailiff, the mind of a coachman, my beauty. Ah, if you were but forty years older!"

Still smiling Doris sealed her letter, then seated herself by the window, where she dreamily watched the clouds.

She did not dream, however, that she was forty years older, but that she received letters as loving as those of her aunt, and that the Duke de Troncantique was just forty years younger than now.

Twelve months rolled by, and the day was near at hand for the consummation of the marriage, when one morning the Duke landed at the château, and earnestly requested the Marquise to meet him at the hazel copse.

The Marquise consented, but upon arriving at the rendezvous—ah, thrice accursed mischance!—the Duke was suddenly seized with an attack of gout, besides suffering agony from an old wound—glorious souvenir of Fonteroy.

"Cleante, my boy, there remains but one thing to be done," he cried. "Go yourself to the hazel copse, and be the bearer of my regrets."

The young man obediently departed on the instant, and singular to say, his heart throbbed at the suggestion of meeting her who had so filled his thoughts.

"It is time for this nonsense to end," he said, taking himself to task. "A sight of the Marquise will dispel my dreams. I know she has white hair, an ungraceful form, and am not even sure that she does not limp."

Cleante had hardly reached the hazel copse when he caught a glimpse, at the end of the road, of a sombre-hued gown.

"Ah," he whispered, "the rose-coloured paper was eighteen years old at most, but this dead leaf frock is a sexagenarian at least." However he could but avow that the delicate silhoutte outlined against the trees, was by no means bent, nor was there the least halt in the gait.

She was approaching him—nearer, yet nearer—the old lady.

Unfortunately her head was bowed, and her eyes fixed on the pebbles of the walk, so that nothing was visible save her white hair, drawn back under the hood of a dark-brown cloak. The hair, however, was certainly very white. After scrutinising the wrinkled face, the faded eyes, the weary mouth, he would smile at his folly.

But while he looked the unknown raised her head, and he saw that her eyes sparkled, her skin was smooth, her lips fresh, and that it was powder, and not age, that had whitened her blonde hair.

Shortly after the hour for the rendezvous the Marquise declared that a headache, from which she had been suffering, was better, and took the path to the hazel copse, intending to secrete herself in the forest, and witness the discomfiture of the Duke at her non-appearance.

"What will my little simpleton say to the old dotard?" she queried, thinking aloud.

Walking softly Madame de Souchevieille entered the underwood, but paused, startled, for just in front of her, moving cautiously like herself, there came the Duke. The two former adversaries stared at one another in alarm for a second, and then simultaneously turned their eyes upon the cross roads of the hazel copse.

There insects hovered about the opening flowers that perfumed the air, the sunshine filtered through green leaves, and seated near each other, hand in hand, sat Cleante and Doris, smiling into one another's eyes.

"I love you, Doris," Cleante was saying.

"And, Cleante, I love you," murmured Doris.

In the flowering hazel trees above them there was a medley of bird notes.

For a moment the Duke de Troncantique and the Marquise de Souchevieille stood as though rooted to the spot, with eyes and ears for naught else save the sweet mystery before them.

Then recalled to their own paltry affairs, they cried with one voice:

"These two children are our heirs. Why not consent to their union, settle the hazel copse upon them, and so end our long controversy?"

And they both added, "in petto," with touching unanimity:

"Thank God! my pride is appeased without the need of marrying."

G. J. Worboise.

Digitized by Google

The Attack on the Mission.

THE sandalled footfall of the Franciscan friar, going to and fro in sun-steeped California, has sealed certain nooks of it, here and there, to an eternal quiet. Such a nook is the valley of the San Diego River. Subject to summer drought and winter overflow, it is as lonely, perhaps lonelier, to-day than when in 1775 a Spanish "presidio" guarded its entrance and a Spanish mission crowned its head. For not only the Spaniard has gone for ever, but all those Indian peoples whose strongholds were in the mountains that still rise beyond the far levels of the mesas like islands out of the sea's edge.

But, however softly the valley sleeps to-day, some thrilling chapters of life were lived in it during its foreign occupation. In November, 1775, eleven Spaniards shared a cruel experience at the old mission then known as the mission of San Diego de Nipaguay.

Two monks, four soldiers and three mechanics—according to strict Castilian ideas of caste—are nine of the eleven enumerated in the military annals of the time. But the pair remaining to complete the tale of souls, fall together by a simple and beautiful law of nature. They were boys.

"My son," wrote Lieutenant de Ortega, commandant of the "presidio," in his official report of the affair, "and a little fellow of ten, the son of my corporal."

Francisco was the name of the commandant's boy, and Juan was the name of the other. They had been sent up from the "presidio" to the mission that they might dwell for a time with the good padres and learn to serve them at the altar. Francisco was thirteen years old, and both youthful acolytes were as thorough boys as ever ached for playtime to come.

So it was on that ever-memorable fourth of November. The last intonation of the vesper services had scarcely died away in the gloomy adobe church, when they were in the sacristy scrambling out of their white gowns, and then through a door opening upon the hill slope at the back of the church. There they made a grand rush for a favourite perch, climbing upon the low mud wall of the unfurnished building.

Often before had they sat there, side by side, to watch the files of Indian converts march by, retiring for the night to their brush village above the mission, and finding a perpetual incitement to wonder in those swarthy faces still so full of the smouldering fires of savagery. But on this particular evening a matter most vital and pressing, from a boy's point of view, choked up the well-spring of curiosity and brought their heads close together in a whispered conference.

"You ask!" urged little Juan, his fat face twisted with anxiety.

"No; you!" insisted Francisco.

"But you are bigger," piped Juan.

"And you are smaller," scoffed Francisco.

Juan drummed hard against the wall with his heels, not screwing his courage up to face a disagreeable necessity, but busy conjuring up fresh reasons why his companion should undertake it.

It seems that the corporal of the mission guard of three cuirassiers, himself an old presidial veteran, being bound on the morrow upon a grand hunt after stolen mission cattle, had suggested to the boys, fine riders both of them, that they might go along with him and see the country. The invitation had brought with it as much anguish as delight, for there were the padres to reckon with.

All day long the boys had hung back from the dread ordeal of asking permission, though each was for ever edging the other on to it. Now the thing must be settled.

"Your father is commandant," said Juan, returning vigorously to the charge.

For once Francisco was silenced. With his bringing-up, military rank was everything, obligation as well as privilege.

"Besides," Juan burst out, feeling that if this did not do the business he was at the end of his resources, "you are almost sixteen."

It was adroitly done. To be almost sixteen meant to be almost a soldier, a tune to which all Francisco's dreams were set. His soft black eyes fired. He glanced indulgently down at Juan—so far off from the glories of cavalry-jacket and carbine!

"I will ask Father Jayme," he declared, "the very next minute I see him."

Juan's countenance showed a veritable sunburst of relief.

"He can only say 'no'" mused Francisco aloud, preparing himself for the worst.

"But if he should say 'yes,'" squeaked Juan ecstatically.

Francisco allowed himself to catch a measure of his small comrade's enthusiasm.

"Why then, Señor Sleepy-Head," he said patronisingly, "if you are not up bright and early, the corporal and I will be off without you."

"But you will call me, eh, Frazquato?" said Juan, with a serene faith in the integrity of friendship.

"We start up yonder," was Francisco's reply, nodding towards a gap in the brown hills opposite them as they sat, and assuming a far more intimate knowledge of the old corporal's plans than Juan possessed. "We follow the river till we come to a valley ever and ever so much bigger than this."

"A hundred times bigger, eh, Frazquato?" suggested Juan, his comfortable acquiescence enlivened by a keen statistical zest.

"A thousand times bigger!" cried Francisco, his imagination bound to exceed a mere baby's. "With rocks and rocks piled up all round it into mountains brimful of Indians."

"If a thousand of them should come after us, eh, Frazquato?" chuckled Juan.

"If ten thousand should come?" cried Francisco. "What then? We will fire off our carbines all together, and you will see them run like wild deer!"

The two boys roused to a tickling sense of their superiority to such savage terrors, looked each other in the eyes and roared with delight. A grey robe appeared round the corner of the church and their faces fell.

Father Jayme was coming to call them to bed.

Digitized by Google

They dropped to the ground with reluctant accord, and went forward to meet him.

"Ask! ask!" gasped Juan, not forgetting the secret business in hand.

The father who encountered them was a large man with rugged features softened by a mild benignity.

But just now a keen twinkle deep in his blue eyes told that he fancied he had all but caught his two acolytes in some piece of mischief—or why had master Francisco gone so pale, and why did little Juan wear such a hangdog air?

He inquired of them shrewdly. Had they been hanging about the barracks, taking in idle soldier-songs and stories?

The question glanced so near their hearts that Juan gave up all for lost. As for Francisco, though he turned paler still, had he not resolved? Were not the very words of his request ranged in order in his head?

"Señor Padre," he began as he intended, and then stumbled over something that must be added impromptu. "We were at the barracks—but only this morning. But only to speak to the Señor Corporal, and the Señor Corporal says would you please give Juan and me your most gracious permission——"

And so, the portentous inquiry being out, the two boys can only wait with their respective hearts in their respective mouths.

Padre Jayme has taken each of them by an ear, pinching hard. Is he very, very angry? They dare not even peep to see.

"So ye are aching, you two, to get leg over horse," he begins after a pause. "'Vaya,' why not?" He is gazing down beamingly at them. "A holiday never does boy or burro any harm. Keep close to Corporal Rocha, a trusty fellow."

The listeners could have leapt for joy. What they did instead was to kiss his hand, receive his benediction, and file demurely off to bed.

"No talking," the padre had warned them. They obeyed with devout exactness until snug in their little cots placed against opposite walls of the refectory. Then was heard suppressed whispers, with ecstacy in every syllable.

Juan was soon sound asleep. Francisco, excited by the morrow, was much longer in losing himself.

He awoke with a great leap of the senses. He thought that the corporal had come in and was holding a lantern to his eyes to rouse him to start. But the room was silent, and all in darkness, except where a single window opening high in the thick wall showed a dim grey square. Could that be the dawn looking in? Was to-morrow to-day at last?

Francisco slipped out of bed, and climbing into the window looked eagerly through the wooden bars, expecting to see the daylight. He was disappointed. The sky was only less dark than the earth. It could not be more than midnight.

The boy was in the act of sliding to the floor, when his eye was fixed by a point of dull light appearing in the direction of the barracks. He did not have time to hope that it was the corporal's lantern after all; the red glow mounted swiftly, approaching him, then passed, hissing like a serpent, high over the roof above him.

Instantly other fiery serpents were darting in many directions. One striking downwards revealed the thatch of the smithy in a dull glare—the glare shot aloft, a puff of flame.

Flames are kindling elsewhere. A bit of hillside, the triangle formed by barracks, smithy and padre's house, where a boy stands dazed, bursts into a weird illumination, is alive with frantic figures, striped like the zebra, spotted like the leopard. Heads bristling with wild feathers toss one above another, higher yet, in a fierce, elastic, soundless dance, and every bound brings the whirling swarm closer and closer to the padre's house.

It has needed this thrilling certainty to rouse the boy there from his stupefaction.

He drops to the floor.

Juan is asleep, with round face upturned to the unearthly glow broadening through the room.

Francisco seizes the child by the shoulders, drags him sputtering and stumbling towards the cell where Father Jayme lies.

Father Jayme drowsily sitting up in bed to wonder at the loud crackling of the roof above him.

"Indians!" gasps Francisco. "Indians! Indians!"

Father Jayme beats upon a wall, calling his companion monk by name.

"Fray Vicente! Fray Vicente!"

Little Juan, wide awake at last, is screaming at the top of his voice over and over: "Will they kill me?"

Nobody pays any heed.

Flakes of fire are falling in the refectory as the four run together there.

Somebody seizes some clothing for the boys, but there is no time to put it on. A wolfish, ear-piercing howl announces the savages at the door.

Father Jayme alone is calm; the others cling to him. He argues gently but firmly, against something that Father Vicente is eloquently urging.

"Surely if my converts are among them they will heed my voice."

A great horror falls upon the three when they see that Father Jayme is going to open the door.

What will become of him—them?

His hand on the latch, Father Jayme turns to give an order.

"Take these children to the barracks. Hold the soldiers back from violence until I come."

The door swings open. Padre Jayme steps forth into the midst of a thousand demons, leaping full in flames of mingling earth and sky, as serenely as ever in the sweet sunshine. The shock of his courage brings an instant's hush. Those within hear his voice in the customary mission greeting:

"Love God, my children!"

For only answer there is a yell of derision. Father Jayme is surrounded, whirled out of sight towards a black hollow beyond the awful glare.

Francisco, boy as he is, finds himself mechanically running with little Juan, making for the barracks. At the door Father Vicente joins them, though at first he would have followed Father Jayme. The three enter together. Alas, for that refuge!

The big room is thick with blinding smoke. Soldiers are darting about in what would be sheer panic but for a voice bellowing out orders:

"Into your 'cueras,' every mother's son of you! Guard powder-horns as the apple of your eyes! Arm, and come this way! This way!"

Thus Father Vicente found Corporal Rocha in full preparation for flight.

"The padre's house?" demanded the corporal of him.

"Gone—and the church!" answered Father Vicente.

It remained to decide upon a last desperate retreat.

Not far from the barracks was that wall of an unfinished building, upon which two boys had been so glad and so tormented about the morrow that no one may live to see. It was a four-foot wall inclosing a square of ground used as a place for lumber, old boxes and casks, and generally known as the "Ceradito," the "Little Inclosure."

Digitized by Google

"To the Ceradito!" was the corporal's word.

He gathered his five fighting men about him, three "cuirassiers," a carpenter and a smith—one smith having been shot to death by arrows in trying to reach the barracks. At that instant the north wall of the building was already one sheet of flames. Oh, the horrible sound of it!

"Every man for himself and for the defenceless!" cried the corporal. "Keep close together. Out with you when I give the word!"

The door flew open.

"To the Ceradito!"

The yells drowned the roar and crackle of the fire. The open hillside was pouring a flood of savages that way. Even strong men held back. Then the wall of flame sucked towards them by the draught and drove the hapless Spaniards forth.

What a moment that was! The eight Spaniards, big and little, in a knot. Some fighters running forward, some running backward, that all might face the foe. The two children stifling in the struggle of strong-limbed men. Juan shrieking, and Padre Vicente lifting him bodily along. Arrows whizzing swiftly through the air; the roar of carbines; shouts, groans; the thick of battle; an eternity of anguish before a voice cries: "The Ceradito!" and all tumble in, two of the nine souls, soldiers both, never to rise again. But the anguish is by no means over.

So desperate was the defence to follow that the old military annalists, busy with the deeds of men, refuse to take any note of the presence of mere children. Hence history, though interesting itself in the suffering of the innocents of all ages, is forced to confess, "Nothing further is known of these two boys"—our poor Francisco and little Juan—"during the rest of this eventful night."

But the other figures stood boldly forth. The corporal called for the casks and the beams with which to barricade an opening left in the wall for a door; luckily material was plentiful.

In clearing the floor for the corporal's purpose some gunpowder was unexpectedly brought to light, fifty pounds of it in a canvas bag, thrust in there for lack of safer stowage, and forgotten. At first hailed with joy, this treasure-trove was speedily seen to be a deadly menace. For a score of Indians, leaving the attack on the barricade to their main body, rushed to seize a mound above the Spaniards and thence throw down blazing brush and tree branches upon them.

Father Vicente had been on his knees praying aloud. He rose at this moment, and seeing the danger, spread himself, a living prayer upon the powder, covering it with his robe, his breast.

But if here was one hero was there not another?

Arrow wounds in his body, his last comrade fallen, Corporal Rocha of the guard, still stood boldly up, firing as fast as two or three of the wounded could load for him, and shouting orders as if directing the volleys of a whole platoon:

"Steady, men! Aim steady! Send every bullet home! Death to the enemies of Spain!"

Gallantly his voice rings out above the din. One against a thousand is he, yet his eye remains keen, his brain brimful of determination to hold the Indians back from that rush, which would quickly end all. This is why he roars in trumpet-tones as if to direct the approach of a relief party from the "Presidio"—alas! six miles away.

"This way to the rescue! Santiago and succour! Close up, Spain! Shoot the renegades down from behind!"

While he is still hoarsely shouting, lo! the silent dawn is come, and the Indians have as silently melted away.

The besieged peer out to make sure of it. Then they turn to look upon each other, Their faces are strange each to each by reason of blood, and the havoc of fire. They are mere wrecks of men; but the corporal and the padre, at least, can speak, clasp hands and thank God.

Suddenly the corporal, staring about him, makes a discovery. Something as like a human creature as the rest of them, only on a lesser scale of inches, is sitting erect in a dim corner of the mud wall.

"Santiago!" ejaculated the corporal in a deep voice of amazement, "it 's Francisco!"

Arrows had spared the lad; not so the flames. His delicate oval face was darkly singed, his long soft, black locks were burnt away, his ten fingers were so many charred sticks.

"And Juanito!" half-blubbered the corporal, recalling that cheery, plump little rogue.

But the blackened spectre of Francisco was able to answer, and with a quick-flashing smile:

"He is here, Juanito!"

The corporal, joined now by the padre, stared harder, but could see nothing. Nothing, that is, except a wide-mouthed, thick-waisted water-jar lying on its side. He went over to investigate. Even the wounded craned their necks to see.

The corporal looked in the jar and laughed. He rolled it over with his foot, a frightened head was thrust out of it and instantly drawn back, and it was only under strong encouragement—the Indians were surely gone!—that there did at last emerge from that strange shelter, very reluctantly, a familiar, plump little form.

Juan was in his bedgown and had one shoe; but, except for the grime of tears on his fat cheeks, as whole and sound as if he had slept the night through in his cot, next the refectory wall.

"In there," said Francisco, explaining the situation with naive unconsciousness of self, "I could keep the fire off him."

"Juan of the water-jar!" grinned the old corporal, dubbing the child off-hand with a nickname that was to cling to him for life.

As for Francisco, least of our heroes—in years—Padre Vicente alone thought to lay a hand in silent approval upon his head, wherefore his good deed remained aware only of its own perfume and not of men's praise. Beside, for him, was there not Juan? A comradeship thus early tried was ever to endure; in saddle and out, in long years to come, Francisco and Juan were ever to remain firm friends throughout the many and varied experiences of two cavalry soldiers in a wild, savage-infested land.

But those who are able must now creep out of the "Little Inclosure," to gaze upon the mission in ruins, and the deserted Indian village above it; to search for good Father Jayme, and to find his dead body down in a hollow whence to-day some noble palm trees spring aloft, fit frame for the crumbling front of a later mission built upon the site of the mission destroyed on that November night of 1775.

T. Candler.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE RIGOUR OF THE GAME.

FOR two days and nights the English and American troops toiled unceasingly whilst they landed guns, stores, forage, and horses, and pushed rapidly ahead for the front at Neuminster.

What few moments of relaxation were snatched by the officers and men from the "old country" were devoted to items of gossip concerning the manner in which the Yankees "fixed up" everything in which they were deficient.

Proportionately to their numbers they were short of cavalry, and Colonel Ritchie proposed that his San Franciscans should be mounted on the German horses captured at Neuminster. General Smithson assented with equal nonchalance, and the English staff were amazed to see the change effected within a few hours. They argued, of course, complete disaster for the regiment should it come into contact with the highly-trained cavalry of the enemy, but they soon had cause to alter their opinion.

There were plenty of spare guns on board the transports and the Duke of Connaught, faithful to his promise of non-interference, did not even elevate his eyebrows when the chief of the United States staff applied for sixty 12-pounders so that he might "fix up" ten field batteries.

The American also asked that a number of non-commissioned artillery officers should be lent to him, until the men "got the hang of it," which he assumed would be the case before they would be needed in action—a statement which brought a sardonic grin to the face of the R.A. veteran whose duty it was to pick out the requisitioned instructors. Nevertheless it will suffice to say that although the United States gunners could not hope to so quickly attain the high pitch of excellence shown by the British artillery, they accomplished marvels in the shape of actual work when the next great battle was fought.

Nor had they to wait long for the much talked-of event.

When two great armies are spoiling for a fight, there is usually not any insurmountable difficulty in accommodating them. The British forces pressed on to Neuminster, and the Germans, on their part, did not let the grass grow beneath their feet in hurrying forward preparations for a strong attempt to hurl the invaders out of the Fatherland.

By a seemingly tacit understanding the British — by which term the United States' forces are quite naturally included—and the German commanders regarded Oldesloe as the ultimate theatre of operations. Although scouting by considerable detachments of cavalry and more determined reconnaissances were indulged in on both sides, there was no serious affair between the belligerents until they had massed their armies within thirty miles of each other, with Oldesloe lying midway between.

During one of these minor affrays a driver of the Army Service Corps earned immortality by a feat of remarkable endurance, which has seldom, if ever, been paralleled in the annals of war.

The company to which he belonged was convoying a quantity of stores along the left flank of the British lines of communication, when suddenly two squadrons of Prussian cavalry swept round the head of a dense clump of trees and delivered a well-timed charge, with the evident object of destroying the train.

The officer in command of the Army Service Corps detachment was young, and had never seen a fight outside the Long Valley, but he put into practice the precepts therein acquired with the ease and confidence of a veteran.

In obedience to his commands, men and horses started from the quiet jog of the march into a thunderous gallop.

Within half a minute they had formed a triangular laager, of which the waggons supplied the three external faces, the horses being safely ensconsed inside.

A sergeant spoke to him.

This is a difficult and dangerous manœuvre either in peace or war.

The waggons advance, for the most part, in echelon formation, and the slightest deviation of a vehicle will infallibly bring down the horses of its successor, possibly involving a section of a column in common ruin.

The formation was accomplished without apparent hitch, and the magazine rifles were soon busy in emptying German saddles. The incident was ended almost as soon as it had commenced. It was then noticed that the driver of one pair of horses did not rise from the ground, where he had fallen after getting his waggon into correct position. A sergeant spoke to him and then bent over him to hear the poor fellow say feebly:

Digitized by Google

"I can't get up, sergeant. My left leg was smashed at the knee-joint by No. 5 waggon when the row commenced."

This gallant soldier had nevertheless kept his seat and guided his team until his duty was performed to the letter. Then the anguish he was enduring conquered his iron nerve, and he collapsed.

At the close of the campaign the Duke appointed him his coachman, but the brave fellow was lame for life.

Field-Marshal Prince Albert of Prussia had been selected by the Emperor to command this second Grand Army. He led his own Westphalian Army Corps into the field, and had at his disposal nine other territorial corps, making a total force of 330,000 men, with 400 guns and 11,000 horses.

This gigantic force had been exercised together, as it happened, during the preceding autumn manœuvres, and Prince Albert was in command on that occasion. He knew his staff thoroughly, and his men had complete confidence in him, for his reputation as a general stood very high, dating back from his distinguished services as a cavalry leader in more than one section of the Franco-German War.

A thoroughly conscientious soldier, to whom fatigue or trouble were unconsidered trifles when duty was to be done, this German Prince had more of the Slav than the Teuton in his composition. Were one told that he was a Romanoff, the lofty forehead, square, stern face, and firm chin, with its heavy underlip, would not belie the story. Such a man, at the head of such troops, was a very solid fact in the way of the British advance.

To oppose him, the Duke of Connaught surveyed at Neumin-ter two fine English army corps of 70,000 men each, and slightly over 100,000 United States soldiers. This total of 240,000 was split up into twenty-four divisions, each containing four small but compact brigades. There were 250 guns of field and horse artillery, and some 12,000 cavalry, to which arm the Americans contributed 5,000.

On the night of the 16th of June, all preparations having been made for an advance in the direction of Oldesloe on the following day, the Duke of Connaught summoned a Council of War.

He briefly stated his plan of action, so far as this could be foreseen prior to actual contact with the enemy.

"From information gathered by a very daring bit of cavalry scouting carried out by the 14th Hussars," he said: "it is evident that the Germans are in greater force towards Hamburg than on the Lubeck side. The British right wing must consequently be of exceptional strength, and I will be glad if General Smithson will regard that as his special post."

General Smithson smiled with the air of a man who has a responsible but highly pleasant task intrusted to him.

"My own troops," continued the Commander-in-Chief, "will form the centre and left wing. With the exception of a small cavalry escort for the guns, which will at the outset be massed in the centre, I propose that the four cavalry brigades be equally divided for service on the flanks."

All present agreed that this arrangement would facilitate the next day's march, as the men could proceed to their allotted positions with the least expenditure of energy, an important consideration, for they were already suffering from the severe strain of the debarkation and subsequent events.

"I take it, Prince," said General Smithson, "that you have not yet made up your mind as to the programme?"

The Duke by this time knew his man fairly well, and understood, without possible reason, that the American officer had some ulterior motive in asking this apparently aimless question.

"I cannot decide definitely upon a certain course until I have learnt something of the enemy's intentions," he replied.

"Of course, of course," assented the other. "I was only figuring things out on general principles, so to speak."

"Well, and won't you tell us what you have figured out, sir," said the Duke, turning earnestly towards his colleague.

"If you think hard enough you'll take the same view."

"You see, it's just this way," was the answer, given in deliberate and convincing tones, "tired men can't fight well, nohow. We'll allow that the enemy is as dead beat as we are after we get jammed close together at the end of the day's march. Nobody will feel particularly bad if there isn't any trouble to-morrow night. Next morning both parties will want to get to business quite early, and the affair won't end in ten minutes. In this sort of country, with nothing but grass plots and bits of forest dotted about the view, there's likely to be more give-and-take fighting than in broken land, where position is half the battle. And I calculate the Germans are about three to two of us."

General Smithson paused to arrange his cigar more comfortably, and every man in the Commander-in-Chief's quarters felt that this shrewd American was about to propound some scheme as the result of his cogitations.

"Odds are odds, all the world over," he continued, "and, on paper, we ought to get a considerable licking."

An impulsive cavalry officer here broke into Smithson's slow speech.

"That is a poor spirit in which to begin," he cried, a hot flush mounting to his face.

The Duke promptly interfered. "Have the goodness to permit General Smithson to proceed. So far, I agree with every word he has uttered."

"If you think hard enough you'll take the same view," said the United States commander, pointing the stump of his cigar at the interrupter. "Now, it seems to me," he went on, "that if we can select the best possible position near Oldesloe, Prince Albert will hurry up to attack us. Two men can hold a place against three, but they cannot turn three out of their location unless they choose to quit. If we can make the Germans sweat themselves against us, our boys taking it fairly easy in between times, we might be able at the close of the game to play them up strong when they have already done all they want to do for one day."

This advice was so obviously sound that it was unanimously adopted, and the impetuous cavalryman seized the earliest opportunity to apologise for the unnecessary heat he had displayed.

"Cork up your energy," said General Smithson good-humouredly. "You'll want it before you go to sleep on the 18th."

Following the example set by Lord Roberts before the recent operations in the valley of the Seine, the Duke of Connaught issued, in the "Orders of the Day," a stirring reminder to his men of the anniversary of Waterloo.

"To-morrow," ran his words, "we will be fortified by the reflection that in facing a vastly more numerous foe we shall be only following the glorious precedent of our forefathers on another 18th of June.

"The firmness, the discipline, the calm courage which enabled the men of Waterloo to crush Napoleon's troops are hereditary qualities in the English-speaking race.

"Whether from east or west of the Atlantic, we are equally the successors of the heroes who fought under Wellington in Spain and France. I have never entered upon any solemn undertaking in the course of my life with such certainty as I feel upon this, the eve of our first great battle on German soil.

Digitized by Google

"Do we need deeds to emulate—they are supplied by our comrades afloat and ashore. We are fortified by the knowledge of their achievements; we are strengthened by the conviction that the guardianship of the sacred cause of our nation is as fully committed to our hands as to theirs.

The Duke rode out in front.

"I have but one instruction to add for the common guidance to-morrow. There is plenty of ammunition. Shoot often, but—above all else—shoot straight."

Both Thomas Atkins and Brother Jonathan read these utterances with much approval. These gentlemen now rejoiced in a common title, "The Busters." For a little while they were at a loss for a synonym which briefly expressed the composite elements of the army, until some pretty wit devised this word, which not only gave an elegant combination of "British" and "U.S.," but also supplied phonetic expression to their peculiar attributes in the robust vernacular of the streets.

There was a philosophic value in the phrase. It conveyed the idea of complete unity, and at once swept aside possibilities of jealousy and differentiation.

The "Busters," then, took affidavit in approved form that they would "plate" or "get the drop on" the Germans to their best powers.

The anniversary of Waterloo should certainly not want a fitting celebration.

The Commander-in-Chief was wise enough to give his men ample rest on the night of the 16th. Not until noon of the following day did the march of the infantry begin. But in the early hours the Duke and General Smithson, safeguarded from risk by a strong cavalry escort, surveyed the country near Oldesloe, selected the ground to be occupied by each division, and gave specific instructions to the staff-officers who would accompany divisional commanders to their particular stations.

On the night of the 17th the weather was fine and clear. From the absolute quiet that obtained in the vicinity of Oldesloe, one might have thought that nowhere on earth did more profound peace and restful security prevail.

The inhabitants of the little town had long since fled.

It was now occupied by the advance Guard of the German army, which was spread over a front of nearly four miles. The British front was more extended, running to fully five miles, and the men lay in the formation already described, two British and one American divisions supplying a reserve stationed a mile in rear of the centre.

Despite the apparent stillness of the allies they were individually as busy as bees. During the few hours of dusk, officers and men of the Sappers worked with feverish activity along the crest and on the slope of a marked undulation in the ground which fell away towards Oldesloe. They hammered tent pegs into the soil, tied long lines of thick cord to these, and measured, and paced, and triangulated as though their lives depended upon a nice pattern being traced upon the face of the earth.

Infantry officers attended these operations with great earnestness, and then hurried off to divide all regimental duties between half battalions.

The result was that 120,000 men slept, whilst their comrades toiled unceasingly with pick and shovel in the construction of field works and shelter trenches.

This quantity of labour skilfully adapted, and every man applying himself like a little steam-engine, can shift a good many cubic yards of earth, and when reveillé sounded at 4 a.m., the entire British front was guarded with two complete lines of entrenchments.

The now weary men—who had, as it transpired, already won the battle by their unflagging industry—retired to eat and sleep. Not even the tornado of lead and gunpowder that soon sprang into demoniacal life disturbed their repose for the few brief hours of rest vouchsafed to them.

Shortly after the relief had been effected firing commenced.

The German artillery tried to devote themselves to a general shelling of the allied position; but our gunners soon altered their views, and a fine duel ensued.

This was damaging enough to both sides while it lasted, but Prince Albert did not delay his infantry attack, which, as the Duke of Connaught had anticipated, assumed the most pronounced form on the right.

Three successive German Army Corps hurled themselves with splendid élan upon the Americans, and were driven back with a precision and loss that must have brought joy to the heart of Jomini himself, could he have witnessed the scene.

At the imminent risk of his life the Duke rode out in front of the centre to a point where he could observe the proceedings. Not one word did he speak to the small staff with him until the third German line reeled away into nothingness before the hail of bullets that beat upon them.

Then he turned his horse's head towards the English lines, observing as the charger broke into a trot:

"If we do as well, this will be the greatest battle in history."

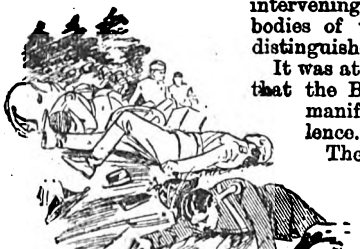
Prince Albert had now got his huge army within striking distance. Although he was surprised and annoyed at the manner and method of the first repulse, he resolved to deliver a sledge-hammer blow at the entire British front.

Six army corps, aggregating nearly 200,000 men, advanced simultaneously across the plains and entered upon the second important phase of the struggle. They were formed in brigades of 5,000, of which one-fourth supplied the fighting-line and the remainder acted as supports and reserves.

This great movement took nearly two hours to complete itself, and when the final impact came it had a directness and power wholly unprecedented in modern warfare.

The battle was now entirely one of the rank and file. Unlike most great engagements, every man was individually and actively engaged.

Notwithstanding the vaunted smokeless qualities of the gunpowder used by the combatants, a murky haze filled the intervening space, and even large bodies of troops could only be distinguished at short distances.



The scene of carnage . . . was one huge canvas of death.

It was at this supreme moment that the British plan of action manifested its real excellence.

The artillery and machine guns had already obtained mechanical range for their different classes of projectiles, and the infantry, by resting their rifles in grooves pressed into the shelter trenches, were able to secure a reliable point-blank trajectory. Fifteen thousand Germans were killed or wounded during that awful half-hour's advance, but still they pressed on, indifferent to death or disablement, and only eager to vindicate their hardly-won reputation as the one invincible army of the world.

Digitized by Google

Yard by yard they doggedly struggled forward, firing with vigour and precision into the ill-distinguished lines in front, staggering oft before the gusts of lead that whistled through them, but still grimly resolved to achieve their object or die in the attempt.

At the precise moment when it seemed that they would succeed, when already this living torrent was about to fill up the British dykes and swamp the whole line in inextinguishable disorder and, perhaps, disaster, two cavalry brigades swept round the flanks at a headlong gallop, whilst the rest of the British horsemen, hastily recalled to right and left of the centre, poured through chaussées left for such a movement across the entrenchments, and struck the disintegrated masses of German troops as lightning darts through a thunder-cloud.

Scattering in small detachments along the entire front, they whirled through the enemy's ranks with appalling effect. For a moment the advancing swarms quivered in the struggle against the shock, and then melted away with the mist that rapidly dissipated owing to the cessation of firing.

When the dust and smoke had cleared somewhat, and the half-frenzied troopers were trotting back to the British lines in twos and threes, the scene of carnage along the five miles of front, for over a mile in depth, was one huge canvas of death.

"Which hand will you have?"

It was pitiable, heart-sickening, more awesome than a plague-stricken city. It moved the victors to compassion, and the vanquished to unalleviated agony. They were most content who laid there, motionless and silent, for even the wounded were yet paralysed with the shock given to the frame by the modern projectile.

Prince Albert of Prussia now knew that he was beaten.

Nevertheless, with the icy coolness of despair, he determined to grasp fate by the throat.

If he could not succeed, it was at least possible to strike such a blow as would render it a question of weeks of delay before the British would be able to advance further into the interior.

The Duke of Connaught, who had grown ten years older during the last hour, anxiously noted some significant changes in the enemy's formation.

Guns and cavalry were being massed in the centre, and infantry were hurrying off towards the flanks.

The Duke was now called upon to solve a momentous problem, and he did so with the acumen and directness of a born leader of men.

He dispatched gallopers to warn General Smithson on the right, and Sir Richard Sheridan on the left, to expect simultaneous flanking movements by infantry, whilst he summoned all the cavalry and guns to assemble in rear of centre with the utmost possible dispatch. By this time, too, the second half of the British army was in the trenches, and the men who ought to have been relieved felt mutinous when ordered to retire. So they were left alone.

Not one moment too soon had the Duke made his new arrangements.

Precisely at eleven o'clock the Prussian Commander-in-Chief launched his final blow.

Under cover of a continuous artillery fire, 15,000 German cavalry, led by the Field Marshal in person—for the secret desire of the Emperor was strong within his own breast—trotted towards the British centre with the intention of repeating Von Bredow's Death Ride at Mars la Tour.

If this avalanche of men and horses could ride through those lines as their predecessors dashed through the French on that memorable day, they might double up the British front, and render successful the progressing flank attacks.

If they gained their object they committed both parties to indescribable slaughter; if they failed, it meant annihilation.

Breaking into a gallop at a distance of 1,000 yards from the British, and heedless of the shrapnel now plunging through their ranks, the German cavalry swept splendidly forward.

They had barely traversed a quarter of the distance when the English and American cavalry brigades appeared on the slight crest of the infantry position, formed in line of columns with quiet rapidity, and Major-General Luck, the divisional leader, placed himself at their head, twenty paces in front of the centre regiment, the 2nd Life Guards.

The right of the line was taken by Colonel Ritchie's followers, who had been christened, no one knew why, the "Sacrament Horse."

No orders were given, for amidst the din they would have been inaudible.

Urging his charger into a canter, General Luck raised his sabre high above his head, and looked back, to the right and left along the line.

A great cheer broke forth, not alone from the troopers but from every living man on the ridge, and the great charge commenced.

As the opposing bodies of cavalry neared each other, the sounds of conflict died away, and the thunder of the horses' feet upon the hard ground grew momentarily in volume.

When they were but a hundred yards apart, a member of the Duke of Connaught's staff yelled hysterically: "Great heavens, the Americans have not drawn their swords!"

They had, but the weapons were dangling by the sword knots from their wrists, and in each man's hands were a couple of revolvers, which he discharged point blank at the German cavalry in front ere the final crash came.

The effect was stupendous. Men and horses fell, the leading squadrons came to grief before they could strike a blow, and in the mêlée which ensued, not a sabre was called into use until each American horseman had emptied the twelve chambers of his weapons into the mass of his opponents.

The result of this decided novelty in an affair of cavalry was soon seen. The three Uhlan regiments which met the soldiers of the United States were beaten immediately.

So rapid and decisive was their discomforture that Colonel Ritchie, who acted as brigadier of the right wing, was able to wheel his men and take the rest of the Germans in flank.

It is no discredit to the English horsemen to say that they did not find their task quite so easy. Lance met lance and sword clashed against sword, and for fully ten minutes the fight was the hardest any man present had experienced.

Locked as they were in the throes of a deadly struggle, for a little while they seemed to be a mere rabble. But at last the Prussians wavered and fell back. At this moment came the diversion of the American attack on the enemy's left flank, and almost before the watching army had realised what had happened the Duke of Connaught gave orders for a general advance from the centre.

Smithson and Sheridan seized the same opportunity to rush at the deploying German infantry, and when the sun sank to rest in the west, Prince Albert of Prussia was lying in the British field hospital, and his magnificent army was non-existent.

The loss of the British forces was terrible enough, even under the circumstances of this glorious victory, whilst General Smithson said ruefully: "If we have a few more battles on this basis the United States will be broke with paying pensions."

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

The Women of England.

"Which hand will you have?"

It was thus that Irene addressed her friend Ethel, looking very saucy and mischievous the while, and holding both her hands behind her back.

"What do you mean, Irene?" asked Ethel quickly, turning white. Her little frame trembled as she caught the merry gleam in her friend's eyes, and a great wild hope thrilled her that perhaps—perhaps——

"Do not tease me, dear," she said with a quivering voice, and a suspicion of tears, "if it is something very, very important."

"You darling," whispered Irene, melted by the appeal, as she put her arm round Ethel's waist, and gave her a warm, impulsive kiss. "You have guessed it—I am so glad; for it's only your second!"

And with this she gave Ethel a letter, with queer stamps and strange marks upon it, and wearing a travel-stained and woebegone appearance.

Ethel's hand trembled as she took it, and she gazed with longing and tenderness upon the bold clear penmanship she knew and loved so well.

"From Simla!" exclaimed her friend. "What a wonderful thing—and, oh, what a funny system they have! It's numbered 114—whatever do they put that for?"

Ethel blushed as she answered with a nervous laugh:

"It isn't they, dear," she said; "it's he."

This vague explanation seemed clear enough to Irene, who made no attempt to disentangle these ambiguous pronouns.

"But what does it mean?" she asked.

"It's a little invention of Frank's," explained Ethel confidentially. "It means this is the 114th letter he has written me. We always put the number on the envelope, so that if any of our letters go astray we shall know at once. That little note I had from Malta was 113, so that I am certain Frank hasn't sent any in between that have gone astray."

"Dear me," said Irene, looking deeply interested, "what a clever notion! I had no idea Frank was half so practical. I must really make Teddy do it. You know, dear, men are sometimes lax; it would keep them up to the mark amazingly. I should like to see Teddy dare to send me No. 200 in answer to my 280!"

"And you always know how many letters you really have had!" added Ethel.

"H'm! rather awkward, won't it be, when it gets into the first ten thousand?"

Ethel looked archly into her friend's face, and smiled.

"You goose!" she said slyly; "long before we get to that, there won't be need of any numbering!"

At which profound but obscure remark Irene beamed with comprehension, and gave Ethel a sudden hug that nearly imperilled her balance.

"But I won't delay you, darling," she went on, with motherly consideration; "I will finish my nocturne whilst you examine your treasure."

And as the sweet strains of Chopin's exquisite nocturne in G floated through the room, Ethel opened her precious missive and, with beating heart and deep thankfulness, read and re-read her lover's message.

"Oh, Irene," she exclaimed, when she had thoroughly devoured its contents, "I don't know when I shall get another. Frank is attached to the Indian army that is invading Russia. He's second in command of the Naval Brigade."

"Is he, dear?" cried Irene joyfully. "You have cause to be proud, Ethel. He is being promoted as rapidly as my Teddy!"

"Our Teddy, you mean!" interjected Ethel mischievously. "But this departure takes him such a long way off, and you can't expect to find post offices available in Siberia. But never mind, we must both be brave. I know that Frank will take as much care of himself as an honourable soldier may, and if anything should happen——"

"Don't, don't," exclaimed Irene hurriedly. "We can at least be worthy of our soldier sweethearts. We must be brave and hope. Honour before love even, is it not? Even if my heart were broken, I should not grudge it for my country—would you, dear?"

The two girls were very silent for a few moments, and Irene, kneeling down by the side of her friend, pressed her hand in quiet sympathy.

"What does he say?" she asked, after a pause which seemed to both like a solemn prayer.

"He tells me he is just starting for the front, and that there is a long march before him; he expects that the army will find trouble in Afghanistan. But he is confident that they will force their way to the Caspian. He believes they will fight their passage through to Moscow, and then he—no, that's all; the rest is quite unimportant."

Irene smiled, and her friend's blush did not escape her.

"A good deal of Teddy's letters are unimportant, too," she said archly. "And, between you and me, don't you like those bits best?"

All Ethel's reply was to snatch up her letter and put it away in some secret lodgment in her dress. Then she turned upon Irene with a look of mock severity.

Lady Irene Vyne and Miss Ethel Harington were amongst them.

"It's really very frivolous of you, my lady," she said, "to be wasting your time in idle jests when we have so much work before us. Has it escaped you that we have each of us to organise our corps of nurses before the end of the week?"

Irene at once looked serious. A few days previously both of the girls had attended a meeting at Marlborough House, summoned by the Princess of Wales. For there was need now of the women of England. In the wake of battle and bloodshed they were wanted to tread with beneficent step, for already the wounded among the English troops had taxed to its utmost the resources of the ambulance corps. The first to realise this, and to plan a scheme of assistance, was the gracious Princess herself, who, after a long interview with Lord Wolseley, had invited the leading ladies of London society to meet her and help her to develop it and carry it into execution.

The Princess quickly found that there were as stout hearts and willing amongst the women of England as amongst the men. She briefly described the sufferings of our soldiers, and the kind of assistance that was needed. Before the meeting was over, nearly every lady of rank present had promised to organise and equip a corps of nurses for transport to on to France and Germany. It was further decided that two trained hospital nurses should accompany each corps.

But this was not all. It was felt that every woman in England, who could afford her time or her money, should be allowed to share the satisfaction of this patriotic work. There was need of money, of lint, of bandages, of appliances—for these requirements had grown beyond the power of the Army Aid Society started by the Times—and the deft fingers of wife and maid alike would find unlimited occupation.

The appeal that was made was taken up with enthusiasm, and in a few days the ambulance question was settled on a scale so magnificent that even the War Office was compelled to admiration.

"But, Ethel, dear," said Irene, when they had discussed

Digitized by Google

it fully, "do you know, I have been thinking that for some of us—the younger of us, I mean—those of us who are strong and healthy, it is not enough to send others. Ethel, is it not my place out there, too?" And she looked wistfully at her friend.

Lord Salisbury occupied the chair.

Ethel crept closer to her.

"Your place? And isn't it mine too?" she asked softly.

"But I, that is you—I mean in France, darling?" Irene stammered.

"I cannot go to Siberia, if that's what you mean," and Ethel laughed gaily. "But if you go, I go also. We are both promised brides of soldiers—of gallant soldiers, Irene—of men who do their duty bravely, and do not shrink from danger even if their lives are at stake. Cannot we do something also?

"I have felt this inactivity a burden, I want to be up and doing. I think I could bear it better if I knew I was not sitting here in safety and luxury, but was sharing the difficulties, if not the dangers also. Irene, dear, let us both go—you and I. It will be something, will it not?"

Irene kissed her friend with a feverish joy. It was her heart's desire.

And when the first contingent of nurses sailed from Southampton, Lady Irene Vyne and Miss Ethel Harington were amongst them.

* * * * *

A few days previous to this, and prior to the landing of the Duke of Connaught in Germany, an important meeting of the Council of National Safety was held at the Foreign Office. Not a single member was absent, and the deliberations were very solemn.

Lord Salisbury occupied the chair, and near him were the Prince of Wales, Lord Rosebery, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, and Lord Wolseley.

Recent events had caused, not public elation, but a more buoyant spirit, a more assured confidence. But the leaders of the nation were grave, and gravest amongst them all was the Commander-in-Chief.

"Our difficulties become at least less overwhelming," Mr. Chamberlain had observed. "Each day has to some extent relieved the situation."

Mr. Balfour shook his head. "The most serious dangers find the stubbornest resistance," he observed reflectingly. "There is a time of heat, of exasperation, of recklessness. But when the most menacing obstacles are swept away, there comes the time when men need qualities that are rare—endurance, persistence, wearisome application to monotonous effort. In my own opinion, we have reached the supreme crisis of the war."

"And the moment," added Lord Rosebery, "when fortunately our best qualities will be called into play. For surely if English soldiers have an acknowledged virtue it is their stubbornness, their calm persistence, and their fertility of resource."

"Let us hope, Mr. Balfour," said the Prince, "that your fears may only prove a matter of philosophic doubt!"

A smile flitted round the Council.

"We are in this position," interposed Lord Salisbury. "Our army in Central Asia will keep Russia occupied. Sir Evelyn Wood is master in his defences, and when the Duke has seized the Kiel Canal, Germany will be unable to make any progress. We have inflicted severe defeats upon France. Locked as the situation is elsewhere, we have to turn our attention mainly to the last-named country. Retaliation must come sharply and vehemently. What are we to do to assist Lord Roberts? It is likely, in fact, that the great struggle of the war will be confined to France. We must concentrate our forces there."

All eyes were turned to Lord Wolseley.

"I am in agreement with Lord Salisbury," he said. "We cannot do all we should like. But whilst the Duke of Connaught and Sir Evelyn may be safely left to hold their own, there is grave peril in France. We have defeated two army corps, but the strongest of all remains—I mean that stationed at Chalons. It has long been mustered there for possible service with Germany, but it will assuredly be summoned to meet Lord Roberts. Our chief necessity, therefore, is to create a diversion, to make some new and counter attack which shall leave Lord Roberts to establish and confirm the advantage he has obtained."

Sir William Harcourt, who had been listening attentively, here struck in.

"A very curious coincidence," he exclaimed. "In one of my spare hours yesterday I amused myself with translating a portion of Homer into rough hexameters. It was the ninth book, when——" and he turned to Mr. Balfour, "you will remember that a similar situation occurs—but," stopping short with a smile, "you will tell me with justice that this will better serve the purposes of a magazine article. I presume, Lord Wolseley, that you propose to land a second army corps in France, and, I should guess, in the south?"

"That is so," answered the Commander-in-Chief a little surprised. "With the addition from Canada and other colonies, together with our new levies, it will not be difficult to land an army of 250,000 men at Marseilles or some such port. If we occupy southern France the Chalons army will necessarily be compelled to march to meet us to protect Lyons. We shall then relieve our forces in the north. It is highly important that we should do this without delay, and that we should be prepared to make a most successful and protracted stand. Indeed, upon the complete success of our operations in the south will largely, I may say entirely, depend the fulfilment of Lord Robert's plan of campaign in the north."

Lord Wolseley here produced a map of the south coast of France, and also a schedule detailing the strength of this new and formidable force he proposed to hurl upon it. For some time a close and eager discussion was maintained.

Then Lord Salisbury observed:

"It is a move of the utmost importance, and needing the finest generalship. Whom do you propose to place at the head of our Mediterranean Army Corps?"

And he looked at the Commander-in-Chief.

Lord Wolseley coloured slightly.

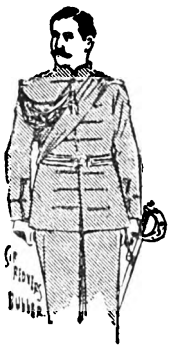
He yearned like a true soldier for actual service on the field of war. His position had kept him at Whitehall, where his extraordinary powers of organisation and his complete grasp of the minutest details had contributed more than the efforts of any other man to the success of English arms abroad. His was the controlling brain, the executive intellect. His foresight, his counsel, his elaborate plans for attack and defence, his unrivalled genius for commissariat, had given a unanimity, a solidity, a sureness to the British tactics, which largely accounted for their success. But he was still a soldier, and might he not now taste some of the active dangers and responsibilities of the field of battle?

Such thoughts had passed through his mind. So, in reply to Lord Salisbury's challenge, he said:

"Gentlemen, this new development in our system of attack is of the gravest and most responsible character. I have remained long in London, and done all that was open to me to expedite our affairs abroad. I think that now it devolves upon me to take upon myself more active duties still. I ask you that I may myself take command of the Mediterranean Army Corps."

Digitized by Google

At these words a dead silence fell upon the Council, and despite the expressionless stolidity which comes of diplomatic training, a look of blank dismay settled for a moment upon every face.



There was not one present who did not know that the whole success of the war depended to a large extent upon the skill and resource of Lord Wolseley at the centre of operations—upon his clear, calm, swift decision exercised in his office in Pall Mall, where he sat at the converging point of all the many complex threads of this involved and intricate struggle. To dispatch him for service abroad was nothing less than to dispense with the brain and nervous centre of the whole British army. Yet they sympathised with the yearning of a born soldier to taste the stimulating joy of actual warfare, and they realised how the Commander-in-Chief's heart must have been from the first in the midst of the troops he loved so well.

But to gratify this desire was impossible. And yet how could it be refused with tact and kindliness?

There was a breath of relief when Sir William Harcourt jumped into the breach at this critical moment. He appreciated the difficulties of the situation, and his subtle mind, accustomed to delicate positions, rejoiced at this new opportunity for wily statesmanship.

"My lord," he said gravely, "what you have said is doubtless of the utmost gravity, and I am sure that a suggestion half wins our consent if made by you. We are prepared to carry into execution any design which your wisdom and experience clearly tell you to be essential for the success of our cause. You are aware that, so far as practical warfare is concerned, we are entirely in your hands. It is your vastly responsible duty to consider any situation that may arise, and, after coming to a mature conviction, to place us in possession of it. We are dependent upon you. I, for one, will be the first to propose that you are placed in command, if you will, remembering the national trust reposed in us, assure us that, from a military point of view, it is absolutely the best and wisest course."

Lord Wolseley sighed inwardly. He realised he was doomed to remain. The Council had shirked the responsibility. They had asked him, as a soldier, and depending upon his impartiality, to settle his own fate. Under such conditions there was but one course open to him.

"Gentlemen," he said quietly, "since that is the light in in which you regard it, I have no alternative. I can now spare General Sir Redvers Buller—the honour must fall to him."

The Council sought discreetly to conceal its satisfaction; but there was an audible movement of relief. And General Sir Redvers Buller, V.C., was duly appointed.

"And yet," grumbled Lord Wolseley to himself afterwards with a quizzical expression of face, as he saw Sir William Harcourt depart, innocence upon his cheeks and a guileless smile upon his lips—"and yet I supported the short service system!"

And he made some trite observations upon the luck of some men as he wrote a brief despatch to Sir Redvers Buller, telling him of his good fortune.

(To be continued.)

Uncomplimentary.—Friend (over the wine after dinner): "Your wife is certainly a brilliantly handsome woman. I shou'd think you would be jealous of her."

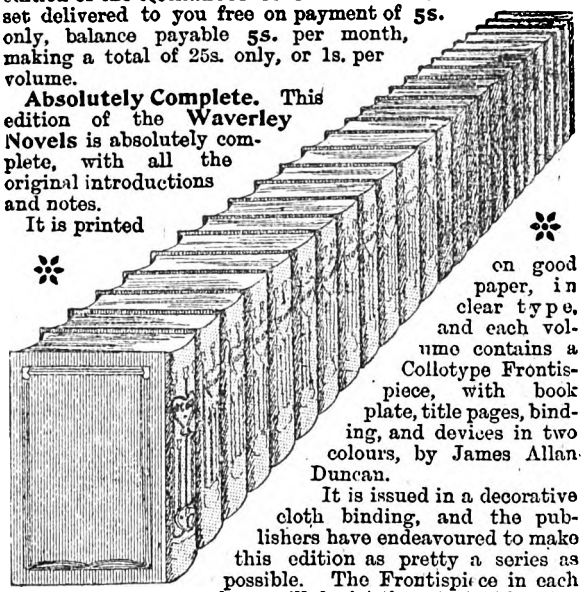
Host (confidentially): "To tell you the truth, Robbins, I am. I never invite anybody here that a sane woman could possibly take the least fancy to."

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.



Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora McIvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Please send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

THE PRINCE'S WOOING.

"But, your Highness," I interposed, raising my hands in consternation, "there will be war if you do not marry the Princess Clothilda. And besides, it was your venerated father's wish that you should wed her."

"Am I heir to all my father's whims and fancies?" exclaimed Prince Amagon, bringing his dainty foot emphatically down on the floor. "Shall I marry a woman whom I have never yet seen, who has never yet seen me, who may be ugly, who——"

"But, your Highness," I again suggested mildly, "the Princess is said to be very beautiful."

"Beautiful indeed!" he cried mockingly. "Why, all princesses are beautiful. There was our sister of Cleves, who of all women was the most ill-favoured. Yet even she was said to be beautiful. Else how would our poor brother of England—poor Henry—ever have been brought to marry her? This Clothilde, likely enough, is just such another ugly, fat person as the old rhyme goes. But even if she were beautiful as the day and brilliant as the sun, I would not wed her. For when I marry I shall take me a wife of my own choice."

'With a cast in her eye
And her mouth all awry,'

"But what shall I tell the Princess, since she is already in the Palace?" I asked helplessly.

"Oh, tell her anything—anything to get rid of her," he answered carelessly, as if getting rid of the Princess were the simplest matter in the world.

"But wait," he added, as I was about to go; "there is still something else I wish to tell you. Now, I know," he began thoughtfully, flicking the flies with his riding-whip, "it is time for me to get married. I owe it to my people and my realm. But I shall choose a wife who suits me, whom I love and who loves me for myself as well as for my possessions.

"Therefore, I have determined to disguise myself as a common working man and go among my people in search of such a woman. I shall set out to-morrow morning, and you shall accompany me. So, after having performed my commands as regards the Princess, also assume the garb of a labouring man and meet me in the market-place by the fountain. You will know me by a green patch upon my sleeve. That is all. You may now go."

The final words were accompanied by a significant sweep of his arm towards the door.

There was nothing more to be said. Bowing and scraping, I backed out of the audience chamber.

However, I had no intention of letting the Prince have his own foolish, sentimental way. It is true, 'tis said, that a stubborn beast must take his own path. But in this case the mule—may I be pardoned my irreverence!—was dragging along with himself to destruction two kingdoms with their several hundred thousand inhabitants, besides bringing ruin to myself, his humble Prime Minister—which latter fact, you may be sure, was by far the most important to me.

Therefore, as I proceeded to the Princess Clothilde's apartments, I pondered in my mind how I could bring about the marriage of the Prince and Princess, and at last I hit upon a plan by means of which, I congratulated myself, this much-to-be-desired event could be accomplished.

Finally, after hurrying through the winding passages of the Palace, I reached the Princess' antechamber, whence, upon mentioning my business, I was immediately ushered by a rosy-cheeked-laughing little maid of honour into the audience chamber itself.

As I entered, a tall, Venus-like young woman, presumably the Princess, came towards me with an eager, radiant smile.

"You come from the Prince, do you not?" she asked.

I bowed a funeral bow, and said in a most tragic tone:

"I do indeed come from the Prince. But would that I did not, for the message that I bear from him is but a sorry one. Your Highness," I continued, "the Prince has been seized by a sudden madness. In spite of all I can say or do, he insists that he will not marry you. Nay, he will not even see your Highness nor hear your name mentioned."

As I spoke the Princess drew herself up haughtily, and her face lost all its sunshine.

Her mouth, tight shut, looked as if it had been chiselled in marble, and her laughing blue eyes were turned to cold-flashing steel.

I paused.

Digitized by Google

THE SECRET OF HEALTH IS EXERCISE.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS.

WEIGHT-LIFTING,
By SANDOW.

WINTER CYCLING,
By C. H. LARETTE.

BOXING,
By Capt. EDGEWORTH JOHNSTONE.

FOOTBALL,
By W. G. MARRIOTT & M. H. STANBURGH

CROSS COUNTRY RUNNING,
By J. E. DIXON

Answers to Correspondents, Sketches, Stories, Etc.

A COURSE OF PHYSICAL TRAINING AT HOME
BY SANDOW FOR HALF-A-CROWN.

See
Physical Culture
December Number. Price Sixpence.

BUY IT TO-DAY.

A GOLD STATUETTE VALUE £500 IS GIVEN TO THE MOST SYMMETRICALLY DEVELOPED READER OF THIS MAGAZINE.

PHYSICAL CULTURE

6D. MONTHLY. | EDITED BY SANDOW. | 6D. MONTHLY.

Digitized by Google

"Well," she sneered, tapping the floor impatiently with her foot.

"Well," I answered mournfully, spreading out the palms of my hands, "if you do not marry the Prince your royal father will undoubtedly make war upon Andalusia."

"And do you think that I shall make overtures to the Prince?" she asked scornfully.

"No," I answered rapidly, "I do not. On the contrary, if you follow my advice, you will first avenge yourself upon him and then marry him."

At this point the Princess' face relaxed somewhat and she showed signs of curiosity.

"To-morrow," I continued, "the Prince in his madness is going to disguise himself as a working-man, and go out into the city to find a wife for himself. Now, not many streets distant from the Palace there is a tavern called the 'Black Boar,' the proprieter of which is a very good friend of mine, since in my youthful days I frequented his tavern, and once in later life was of slight service to him when charged with some trifling offence. If your Highness were to disguise yourself as a barmaid and come to this tavern to-morrow morning, I would take the Prince thither, also; and then it would be an easy task for you to bring the Prince, who is young and inexperienced in matters of beauty and love, vanquished to your feet. Thus would you obtain your revenge and at the same time prevent a terrible war."

"But——" faltered the Princess.

"And," I urged, "he said such shameful things about you. He said that you were as ugly and fat as—as—and he sang a ribald rhyme—which I blush to repeat—

'She's a cast in her eye,
And her mouth's all awry,' about you."

"Well, perhaps——" She hesitated. "But are you sure the tavern is safe?"

"Your Highness," I answered, "the tavern is wholly at your service. You may bring your own retinue."

"And how shall I know the Prince?"

"He will have a green patch on his sleeve."

"Then," she said, resuming all her former haughtiness of demeanour. "I shall consider your proposition. To prevent a war I may do as you desire. You may now go."

But before I reached the door she called me back, and, bending down, anxiously asked:

"Did he really say those horrid things about me?"

I bowed.

"You may go," she said, drawing herself up frigidly.

At about ten o'clock the next morning the Prince was kneeling at the feet of the Princess Clothilde in the little side chamber of the "Black Boar." By what means the Princess had brought him to this position I cannot say, for I had been sitting in the large guest-chamber while she was practising her arts upon the Prince in the room next door.

But just now, tired of awaiting further developments, I had, so to speak, taken matters into my own hands and was peering through the doorway.

That is how I knew the Prince was on his knees.

Evidently, the Princess had not revealed herself, for the Prince with outstretched hands and upturned face, was crying passionately, "Grisette, Grisette, I love you."

The Princess flung back her head and laughed a shrill, mocking laugh.

"Why, who would ever marry such a ragged vagabond? My Karl is a thousand times as pretty a fellow as you."

"And who is this Karl?" eagerly demanded the Prince.

"Oh!" she said, "he is a master carpenter, and only twenty-three years of age. And when he comes of a Sunday to take me to church he wears a fine new silken doublet and a long feather in his cap. You," she said contemptuously, "look like my old grandmother's patch-quilt with that great green patch on your sleeve."

"But," pleaded the Prince ardently, "if it is honour and wealth and fine clothes you desire, I can give you more than anyone else in the country. If you will marry me you will have your own coach and four, and your own maids to wait upon you."

"Oh! indeed," said the Princess, "I'll be glad if you do not run off without paying the reckoning. Why, to hear you, anyone would think you were the Prince himself!"

"And I am the Prince; I tell you I am Prince Amagon himself," said he proudly.

Again the Princess' mocking laughter rang through the room.

"That is a good joke," she cried. "Your Highness indeed!" and she swept him a mocking courtesy. "Why, if you be the Prince Amagon, I am the Princess Clothilde."

"But Stein, my Prime Minister, is here, and he will bear witness that I speak the truth," persisted the Prince.

"And Stein will bear witness that I, too, speak the truth," mocked the Princess.

"Stein!" called the Prince.

Being near the door, I did not take a long time answering his summons.

I was in the room in an instant.

As I entered the Prince caught me by the sleeve.

"Am I not the Prince Amagon?" he demanded. "Do I not speak the truth?"

"Your Highness does, indeed, speak the truth," I answered, bowing gravely.

"And I," the Princess cried, clutching me with mock eagerness by the sleeve "am I not the Princess Clothilde? Do I not speak the truth?"

"Your Royal Highness also speaks the truth," I repeated, with a bow for her.

The Prince stared.

Suddenly the Princess broke out singing shrilly:

"I've a cast in my eye,
And my mouth's all awry."

Then the Prince understood, and he did the wisest thing that could be done under the circumstances. He said nothing; made no excuses or protestations; but silently he drew her, laughing, blushing and half resisting, to his breast.

L. Digby.

Digitized by Google

Who would be without a
MUSIC STAND

Folding and Portable, Square legs, Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8/6. Carriage Paid.

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

3/-

Joseph Riley & Sons,
Constitution Hill,
Birmingham.

ZOX
CURES
NEURALGIA
Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.
PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.
Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.
Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.
ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.
Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plan., Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsom Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.
Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.
THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.
Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

KEATING'S LOZENGES
THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENCES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.
Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

Sulpholine Lotion,
For Clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion
and Pleasing Appearance
SHILLING BOTTLES.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS
GOOD! ITS MASON'S
MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.
Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.
ALSO TRY
MASON'S WINE ESSENCES AND MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.
Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/6.
Agents Wanted.
Manufacturers—
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

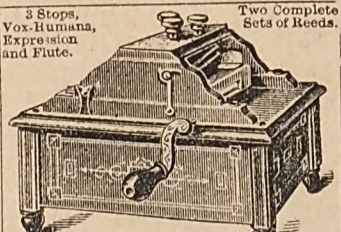
GIVEN AWAY
HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR
A 300 HOUSE
LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS.
PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½D AND 3D BAR.
CHANCELLOR SOAPS
Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

AT [illegible] LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.
Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine on the market. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

DIRECT FROM THE PATENTEE & SOLE MANUFACTURER TO THE CUSTOMER AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
THE WONDERFUL ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE.
3 STOPS
SPECIAL OFFER.—A FOUR GUINEA ORGANETTE FOR 35s.
WITHOUT increasing the price of the Orchestral Organette (our latest production), we have succeeded in producing the very ACME OF MUSICAL INVENTION, an instrument with as much variety of tone as an organ costing £25. Every Orchestral Organette is supplied with 28 FULL-SIZE AMERICAN ORGAN REEDS. The reeds are placed in a novel manner (patented) over a double suction bellows, and are controlled by THREE STOPS as follows, viz., Flute, Expression, and Vox Humana furnishing the GRANDEST ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS. THE RANGE OF MUSIC AND TONE IS PRACTICALLY UNLIMITED. By the manipulation of the stops, a tone as soft and sweet as a zephyr or a loud, long, and swelling melody, and all manner of pleasing combinations may be produced at the will of the performer. For HOME ENTERTAINMENTS THEY ARE UNSURPASSED. Bear in mind that each instrument has FOURTEEN MORE REEDS than any other Organette in the World. We REFUND THE MONEY AND PAY CARRIAGE to anyone not entirely satisfied after receiving it. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone, young or old. You can play DANCE, SACRED, OR SENTIMENTAL MUSIC with as much effect as that produced by a FIRST-CLASS FOUR-PIECE ORCHESTRA.—Our regular price is £4 4s.; but as we have found a well-pleased customer our best advertising medium, we have decided to sell a limited number as an introduction to the readers of this Paper, at £1 15s., provided the order is received not later than the date printed in the coupon immediately beneath the illustration of the Organette. We will give a selection of MUSIC FREE with each instrument. Send money and Coupon by Registered Letter, Crossed Cheque, or Money Order to J. M. DRAPER, BIA KRUIN. For 2s. extra the Organette will be sent to any part of the United Kingdom, carriage paid. List of Tunes and full particulars sent anywhere free. Visitors can inspect the factory daily from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturdays close at noon. N.B.—ABOVE TIME EXTENDED TO FOREIGN CUSTOMERS. Address:
J. M. DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.
Largest Organette Works in the World.

3 Stops, Vox-Humana, Expression and Flute.



Two Complete Sets of Reeds.

By Royal Letters Patent,
A MERE CHILD CAN PLAY IT.
Size 13in. long, 12 in. wide, 9½in. high, weight 8lb.

COUPON 223.	Any reader of this Paper who forwards this Coupon before the dates named herewith can receive ONE Orchestral Organette at reduced price of 35s.
REGULAR PRICE, £4 4s.
REDUCED ICE, £1 15s.
GOOD UNTIL JAN. 7, 1899.
Signed, J. M. DRAPER.

EASY PAYMENTS.—Owing to many enquiries asking us to put the Orchestral out on easy payment system, we have decided to sell a limited number on following easy payments: 10s. deposit and 5s. monthly. Price 40s. Full particulars on application. Write (mentioning this paper) J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, Blackburn.

Digitized by Google

MANY HAPPY RETURNS OF THIS PAGE.

C. V. thinks that more coffee is drunk in France than in any other country; a friend disputes this, so C. V. comes to me to settle the question.——According to statistics published some time ago, it appears that the people of the United States consume more coffee than all the inhabitants of Europe. The annual consumption is set down at 318,170 tons for the U.S., 136,300 tons for Germany, 77,300 tons for France, and only 12,500 tons for Great Britain, where tea is more in favour.

Old.—It was Dickens who described a bank-note as a curl-paper from the locks of the ever-beautiful old lady of Threadneedle Street. Cobbett dubbed the Directorate of the Bank "the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street" because the Directors were apparently trying to stem the tide of national progress like Mrs. Partington and the Atlantic.

Sword.—A linesman's sword costs five guineas; a cavalry sword costs £7 10s. The latter, which measures thirty-four and a half inches and weighs two pounds nine ounces, is not regarded as a perfect weapon, for the reason that it is intended both for cutting and thrusting, and a weapon suitable for both purposes and yet "perfect" from an expert's point of view, has not been devised yet.

G. M.—Meat "wastes" less in boiling than in roasting and baking. Waste is due to the evaporation of water, the melting and escape of fat, and the exudation of nutritious juice in the form of gravy.

Flora.—The Arctic region is more extensive than you appear to imagine when you say that it is impossible for flowers to grow within it. The border of that frigid zone is not so very far away from us. Flowers are scarce towards the Pole, but within the limits of the Arctic region there are 162 varieties, all of them being white or yellow.

Leo is interested in the lion's mane. "Why does it have such a thick, cumbrous mane?" he asks. "It seems that it would be in the way."——The explanation given by some naturalists is that it is to protect the muscles of the neck and head in a fight. Those muscles are of great strength, and it is important that they should be protected, and that part of the body is always the first to be attacked by a foe of its own kind. Moreover, the mane protects the muscles from changes of temperature, so that they do not stiffen from cold or become relaxed through heat.

L. T. H.—The largest history ever published is "The History of the Rebellion," issued by the United States Government. It consists of 120 large octavo volumes of one thousand pages each.

Broker.—The first establishment of a pawnbroker's was made in Freisingen, Bavaria, just seven hundred years ago. In 1350 one was opened in Salins, France, and another in London eleven years later. None of these was successful. The Paris Mont de Piété was established in the year 1777 in the very street in which the head office now stands.

T. W.—All watches are compasses. Point the hour hand to the sun, and the south is exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII. on the dial. For instance, suppose it is four o'clock. Point the hand indicating four to the sun, and II on the watch is exactly south. Suppose again that it is eight o'clock. Point the hand indicating eight to the sun, and the figure X on the dial is due south.

T. L., who is himself country-bred and has only been in London a few months, says he has been struck by the number of "country-men" in the metropolis, and asks me to tell him what proportion of the inhabitants of London are "from the country."——According to the last census, rather more than one-third.

Needle.—Sewing machines driven by electric motors are used in a large costume establishment in Paris. The current is obtained from the street mains. I know of no such machines in London.

Alfred J. T.—New Zealand has set apart two islands for the preservation of its remarkable wild animals and other animals; thereon all hunting and trapping are forbidden.

M.—The Grand Ducal house of Mecklenburg is the oldest sovereign house in Europe. The princes claim descent from Genseric, the leader of the Vandals, and there is not much doubt about the claim. To this day the princes of the house, in their full style, call themselves "Princes of the Vandals."

Star.—The "Lone Star State" is Texas, its banner bearing one star. It is said to have the following origin. The first Governor of Texas had to send a dispatch to New Orleans; on concluding the dispatch, he found he had no seal, so he cut a five-pointed brass button from his coat and used that for the purpose. The authorities at New Orleans thought that it was intended as a representation of the State; hence the name.

Tippler.—The spoon in your glass filled with hot whisky and water prevents the breaking of the glass, because the metal readily absorbs a large part of the heat of the water.

T. L. S.—The little canals which permeate the dentine of the teeth are only 1-12,000 of an inch in diameter.

Mabel.—(1) The law of Denmark gives to every Danish subject, man or woman, the right to a pension at sixty years of age, except in cases of convicted criminals, of those who have fraudulently made over their property to relatives, of those who have brought themselves to distress by extravagance, or who have during the preceding ten years received relief from the parish, or who have been convicted of mendicity. (2) Home Cookery ought to suit you for the purpose you mention. It costs a penny on the first of every month.

Bumptious.—London pays 42 per cent. of the income-tax of England and Wales, and its government and management cost about £11,000,000 a year.

H. T. P.—I should think the Chinese burglar. He takes an ingredient of his own, burns it, and blows the smoke through the keyhole of the bedroom where the master of the house is asleep. The fumes dull the senses of the victim just enough to make him helpless, while at the same time permitting him to see and hear everything that goes on in the room. The only antidote against this charm is pure water, and most of the wealthy Chinese folk sleep with a basin of this near their heads.

Arthur.—In Italy thirty persons out of 10,000 die by the assassin's knife.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Dec. 6th, if intended for the Issue on sale Dec. 20th, and dated Dec. 24th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WINNERS in the FIRST 'HOMELAND' COMPETITION.

For full report of this unique contest see the November issue of "Homeland." The following is a selection from the list of winners who each received a cash prize of £5 in our first contest:

Mrs. Beck, Estate Office, Sandringham, Norfolk. William Pedrick, The Deanery, Canterbury. Frederick Hill, 21 Barrington Street, Limerick, Ireland. E. Kaye, 8 Harley Street, Ashton-under-Lyne, Lancashire. W. S. Mitchell, 95 Britannia Terrace, Elland, Yorkshire. Geo. W. Norman, Oak Villa, Huntly Grove, Peterborough. Margaret Hay Bell, The Red Lion Hotel, Horncastle. Mrs. S. Smith, 20 Hornby Terrace, Morecambe. Andrew A. Campbell, 18 Battlefield Avenue, Langside, Glasgow. Mrs. M. E. Light, 6 New Road, Chippenham, Wiltshire. Rachael Alice Gankroger, 338 Rochdale Road, Todmorden. Mrs. S. Woodley, 13 Caledonia Place, Clifton, Bristol. Benjamin Varley, 9 Reginald Street, Derby. William C. Harrison, 5 St. Kilda Street, Kirkdale, Liverpool. Mrs. E. M. Maskelyne, 1 Home Villas, Western Road, Romford. Miss Eliza J. Scurle, 181 Dereham Road, Norwich, Norfolk. S. Shipp, 104 Palmerston Road, Woodstone, Peterborough. Charles Wright, Goulceby, near Lincoln, Lincolnshire. David H. Steele, Huntly Terrace, Kelvinside, Glasgow. J. G. Mascall, Silver Street, Stansted, Essex. William C. King, 12 Grafton Street, Ashton-under-Lyne. C. Hill, 4 North Terrace, Grantham. Mr. W. Roberts, 31 Victoria Street, Clifton, Bristol. Miss May Randall, 6 Westbourne Villas, Faraday Road, Acton, London, W. Mr. R. Fisher, Red House, Waddingworth, Lincoln. Miss M. Stuart, The Grange, Farnborough, Hants. J. Seaman, 54a Downsell Road, New Town, Stratford. Sergeant-Major W. J. Elliott, R.A., Doon Villa, Princes Road, Freshwater, Isle of Wight. Mrs. John Whiteside, 44 Ramilies Road, Smithdown Road, Liverpool, and many others.

THE FULL LIST APPEARS IN THE NOVEMBER ISSUE OF "HOMELAND."

A New Competition.

£5 FOR CORRECT ANSWERS.

Encouraged by the great interest which has been shown in our first competition, we have decided to hold another one, which we expect will prove even more attractive. During the long evenings of the present season, the attempt to solve the following Magic Square Puzzle will form a pleasant pastime, and we feel sure will be the means of introducing Homeland to numerous firesides where at present it is unknown. For correct solutions we shall give £5 in cash. Full particulars of the prize awards will be published in Homeland.

4	8	2
3	5	7

THE MAGIC SQUARE PUZZLE.

The puzzle is to form a magic square. That is, a different number is to be placed in every one of the nine divisions of the diagram, so that every column, every row, and each of the two diagonals shall add up to 15. This is to be done without removing to other divisions more than is necessary of the six figures already placed. What is the simplest possible solution? You need not cut this paper; simply draw the diagram on your letter.

At first sight it occurred to us that an apology would almost be needed for placing before our readers such a simple little puzzle. But experience has taught us that people are as ready to imagine difficulties where they do not exist as to overlook them when they occur. It is an interesting fact that this little poser was made by a girl of twelve. Her ten-year-old brother produced an answer in two minutes, her mother did the same in a quarter of an hour, her aunt in seven minutes, but her father declared he could not be bothered with such things—which meant he would puzzle it out on the first opportunity when he got alone.

In sending in your solution, mention how you would like the prize-money sent; we will send it on in any way that winners may prefer.

What is "Homeland"?

To enter this unique competition you must be a paid-up yearly subscriber to Homeland, which costs but 1/6 per year, post free. What is Homeland like? Homeland is unlike anything you ever saw or read. It is more original, more novel, more entertaining, more instructive—it appeals more to the heads and hearts and homes of the people than any other publication. There is a true inwardness about its matter and make up that is peculiar to Homeland. It enables thousands of men and women, boys and girls to become bread-winners. Its Graphology Club, its Lady Ganton Gossip, its Homeland Pet Lovers' Association, its prizes for good character, its offers of assistance in times of trouble, its Fashion Notes, its Serial and Short Stories, Children's Corner, Kitchen Chats, and Pictured Bits are all original. It costs but 1/6 a year, and in no other way will 1/6 bring you so much originality, entertainment, and instruction.

With your solution of this puzzle send postal order for 1/6 to pay for twelve months' subscription to Homeland, also a stamp for reply. If you have already subscribed, mention that fact in your letter, and we will extend your subscription from the time the present one expires.

ADDRESS:

THE "HOMELAND" PUBLISHING CO.

(Department 86),

118 & 119 NEWGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"MATCHLESS"

WARNING TO LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY. Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. If it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning. BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

METAL POLISH.

PATON, CALVERT & Co. MANUFACTURERS LIVERPOOL.

RED WHITE AND BLUE

SOLD EVERYWHERE

FRENCH COFFEE

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

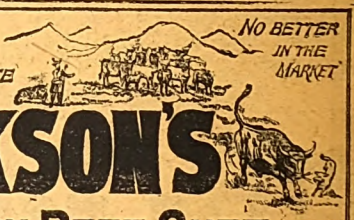
TRUE WEAR

NEC ASPERA JUVANT.

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

EXTRA REFINED THEREFORE NO WASTE

NO BETTER IN THE MARKET



DICKSON'S

SCOTCH BEEF SUET

GAINED HIGHEST REWARD AT COOKERY EXHIBITION 1897.

One lb will go as far as two lbs of ordinary suet.

Sold at all stores & throughout The United Kingdom.

THOS. DICKSON & SON, LTD. EDINBURGH.

ASK FOR & INSIST ON HAVING

HARRIS'

DELICIOUS & ABSOLUTELY PURE

MADE ONLY BY HARRIS AND Co

GOLD MEDAL

BERMONDSEY CAKE FACTORY, LONDON, W.

OF STORES & GROCERS EVERYWHERE

CAKES

APPLICATIONS FOR SOLE AGENCIES INVITED

IT IS NOT Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

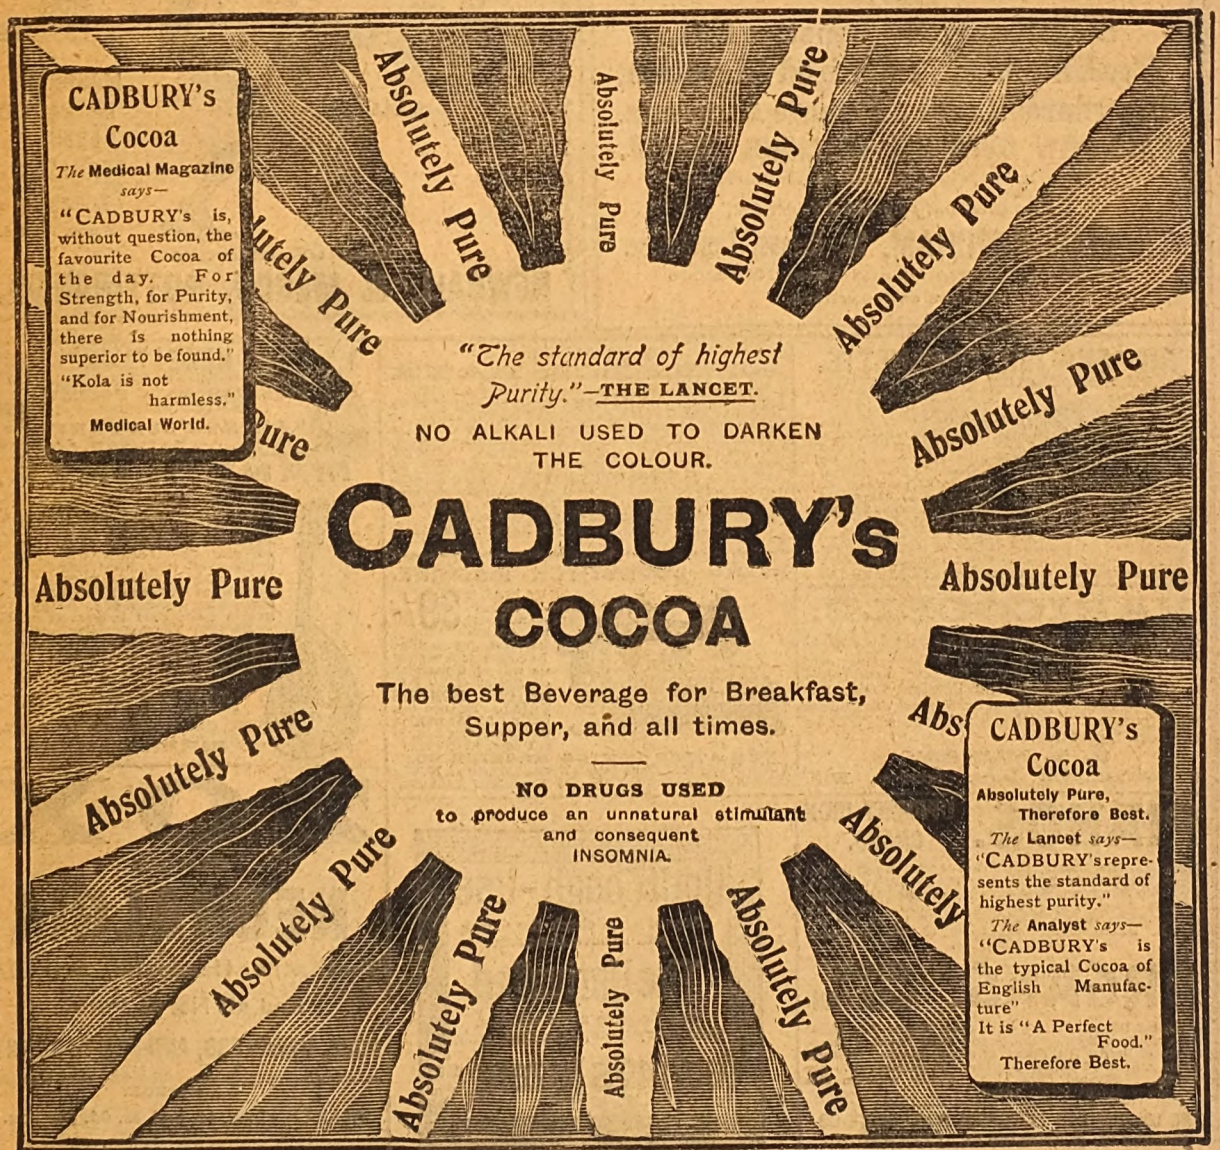
Digitized by Google

£1 SOVEREIGN FOR YOUR NAME AND ADDRESS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 519. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 10TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.



Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP EASY PAYMENTS. 4s. MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it. Most marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

4/- MONTHLY

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. Mention this paper.

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers, 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

LOOK HERE!

To introduce our large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties we will send for Four Stamps one pair SCISSORS and a POCKET KNIFE post free.

VARIETY COMPANY,
(Department 9) DALSTON, LONDON.

MANDOLINES.

PINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S,
ON CONSTITUTION HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

habitation on the south coast, overlooking the terrible Manacle Rocks of which more anon.

Both gentlemen were in very comfortable circumstances, as their parishioners were well-to-do and treated their spiritual advisers liberally. They had to, or woe betided them. St. Keverne was a director of the Cornubia Phoenicia and Roman Serpentine works (now in the hands of a Receiver) he received good tithes from the farmers in the neighbourhood, for it is a rich pasture country; and the Manacles were a continual source of profit.

Many a stately trireme and proud galley went to pieces on those treacherous rocks, and though the crews were never saved, yet a good deal of the cargoes was brought ashore, and of course St. Keverne expected to be presented with a very fair share. It is said that a fisherman of Pictish origin who had settled in those parts objected strongly to the Saint having so large a proportion of the salvage, and held a meeting to protest against what "in his opeenion was a maist awfu' extortion."

But when St. Keverne heard of this he promptly excommunicated the malcontent, cast spells over all his belongings and generally made his life a misery to him, and threatened to build a lighthouse on Manacle Point if he heard any more grumbling.

These vigorous measures had the desired effect. The parishioners kicked the Pict into Porthoustock Cove, and presented the Saint with a serpentine pulpit for his church as a mark of their reverence and esteem.

St. Just's was a mining district and there were some very rich setts in the neighbourhood; such as Botallack, Levant, Huel Owles and Huel Cock and lots of others. St. Just held shares in nearly all of them and in addition he received dues from the adventurers to pray for success to the bal. The pilchard fishery was good too in the summer, and the Saint had to be propitiated to attract the fish and drive away porpoises. So that, taking all in all, St. Just was quite as well off as St. Keverne.

One day St. Just had an idea that he ought to stroll across and hunt up St. Keverne. He hadn't seen anything of him for a long time, and the thirty miles or so would be a nice little walk; and if he had an early lunch and started directly after he would get there in time for tea.

Then he could stroll back in the cool of the evening. Saints moved more quickly in those days than they do now; there was more competition. So he donned his best seven leagued boots and after a very pleasant walk reached St. Keverne's house.

St Keverne was superintending the whitewashing of his garden wall and inciting his myrmidons to work a little more quickly, in language more forcible that polite.

But he brightened up when he saw his visitor.

"Aw, my tender dear, is that you sure enough? You'm quite a stranger, but I'm main glad to see 'ee. Are 'ee feeling pretty tolerable now, my son?"

"Iss, I'm brave, but fair chacken for a dish o' tay. Have 'ee had your tay yet?"

"No, I'm going in to have it directly most. Come inside, my son, you'm kindly welcome. Jenifer," he called to the servant, "bring in tay as soon as you can," here he dropped his voice to a stage whisper, "and put out the new tay set. Would 'ee like to wash your hands before you sit down, my son," he asked St. Just, who replied in the affirmative, and was conducted to the best bedroom to "clane" himself.

* * * * *

Now it so happened that a galley from the sunny south had, a few weeks previously, come sailing up the Channel, bound for Looe, intending to take back a cargo of copper brought down from Caradon Hill.

One of St. Keverne's parishioners caught sight of it coming up from the West just at dusk, and, of course, he rushed back to the village with the joyful news. The simple-minded fisherman thought that nothing less than a display of lanterns would suffice to celebrate the occasion, and to add more picturesqueness to the fête, fastened the lanterns on donkeys' backs and paraded the beach with them.

What happened on board the galley never transpired, but it was generally supposed the captain mistook his bearings and thinking he was off Falmouth Harbour steered, as he fondly imagined, straight into it.

After the Manacles had done their work satisfactorily, coracles began to put out in large numbers for the ostensible purpose of rescuing the crew of the galley. They did not succeed in a single instance in that laudable desire, but managed to save most of the cargo, after tremendous efforts, judging from the terrific row which went on all night.

Next day a deputation waited on St. Keverne asking him to pray for the souls of the departed sailors, and bringing him a small present saved from the ship. This was a tea-set of the most beautiful china, exquisitely painted and mounted with superbly chased silver. It had been intended as a present to the King of Looe, but how was St. Keverne to know that? So he accepted the offering graciously, thanked the deputation, gave them his blessing and dimissed them.

Up to now he had had no opportunity of showing off his prize, so he rather hailed the advent of St. Just with delight. For saints are very like ordinary folk in that respect; if they have anything new they can't rest till they have flaunted it before the eyes of an admiring friend.

St. Just came in to tea with a glowing face, the result of his ablutions. He glowed a trifle more when he saw the meal provided for his refreshment. They still have teas like that in Cornwall, thank goodness: in out of the way places where fashion has not yet set her ruthless foot.

None of your wafer-like bread and butter and thin strips of tennis cake, which have to be balanced on the edge of a saucer, as there are no plates provided. No, this was a Homeric tea, if there be such a thing. Muggotty pie, cold beef-and-tatie pasty, junket and cream, gooseberry tart, a huge saffron cake and a figgy fuggen; and if you want to know what that is, go down to Cornwall and see. Well might St. Just lick his lips as he gazed on the spread.

"Cluck 'ee down there, my son," said St. Keverne, politely handing St. Just a chair, after saying grace, and St. Just "clucked" accordingly; and started to take in ballast for his homeward journey. In fact he devoted so much attention to his inner man that St. Keverne feared his new tea-set would escape notice altogether.

So after rattling his spoon against a saucer and trying other devices to attract his guest's attention to his china, he plumped the question straight out.

"What do'ee think of this bit of cloam, my son?"

St. Just gazed at the said bit of cloam, struggled manfully with a mouthful of pasty, overcame it, and ejaculated: "Clane-off," and once more loaded himself up with pasty.

"Iss, 'tes so sure enough," replied his host, rather disappointed that his guest did not show more enthusiasm about it, and gave a long description of the wreck and subsequent rescue, while St. Just munched away and nodded acquiescence.

Digitized by Google

But though St. Just did not seem to take much interest in the "cloam," he was in reality breaking the Tenth Commandment as hard as he could go.

He had spotted the set directly he sat down at the table, and had been debating in his mind ever since as to how he could manage to get hold of it, by fair means or foul. For he saw that the possession of such a neat bit of china would add greatly to his social position with the élite of north Cornwall.

But he knew that St. Keverne would want a very long price for it, even if he would part with it at all, which wasn't likely. So, St. Just inwardly determined to bide his time and see what turned up; and in order not to appear too much interested in the "cloam" he turned the conversation to religious topics, deploring the ritualistic practices of St. Kenwyn, up Truro way, which were creating much commotion in the county.

However, fortune generally comes to him who knows how to wait. Their saintships had finished tea and were having a spirited argument as to the respective merits of bags and plates for collection purposes; St. Just holding that plates were opposed to the principle of not letting your left hand see what your right hand was doing, and also that people would let a plate pass when they would put a penny in a bag. St. Keverne held the opposite view and argued that a person would put sixpence in a plate for appearance sake, while he would put a button into a bag. They were arguing as only Saints can argue when the door opened and Jenifer appeared.

"Please, feyther, Mrs. Chegwidden wants 'ee to come and see her to once."

"Aw, drat the woman," said St. Keverne, rising from his chair. "Why couldn't she wait till morning? Well, I reckon I must go. Will'ee 'scuse me for a bit, brother Just, while I run down and see her?"

"Certainly," replied St. Just. "I'll wait till'ee come back." So away went St. Keverne to see his troublesome parishioner, leaving St. Just alone in the room with the coveted "cloam."

No sooner had St. Keverne's footsteps died away in the distance than St. Just transferred all the tea-set into his somewhat capacious pockets and walked out of the room.

"Jenifer, my dear," he called. "I'm going to walk round the garden a bit till your master returns," and he stepped out into the garden, down the path to the road, and, making sure that no one was watching, made tracks for his home in Penwith as hard as he could go.

St. Keverne's parishioner did not keep him as long as he expected and he was back in twenty minutes. "Where's St. Just to?" he called to Jenifer, who replied that his Reverence was in the garden. But a short search showed that his Reverence was not in the garden, and St. Keverne, much perplexed, came back into his dining room. There his eye caught the vacant space on the tea-tray, and a closer examination showed him that his beloved "cloam" was gone.

He was sufficiently acquainted with his brother saints to guess at once what had happened, so with the single ejaculation: "Aw!" he rushed out and started in pursuit of his late guest.

As he crossed Crowza Down it struck him he had no weapon either of offence or defence, so in case St. Just should show fight, he picked up some rocks of ironstone and put them in his pocket. As these rocks weighed several hundred pounds apiece they impeded his progress rather; but he got over the ground pretty quickly.

St. Breaga, who was watering her front garden and saw him go past, said afterwards that he was "Coos'n down the road like as if he were pisky led."

At last as he turned a bend in the road he caught sight of his quarry some little way on ahead. St. Just was afraid to travel too quickly for fear of breaking the teacups, and he also thought he was quite safe by now, so he was marching calmly along, humming the Furry Song, when he was suddenly brought up standing, by hearing someone shouting behind him.

He turned round to see St. Keverne flying after him, very much out of breath but evidently meaning business.

"Here, Just, you gashly thief, what have 'ee done with my cloam?" gasped the outraged Saint. St. Just thought that perhaps a soft answer might turn away wrath, so he tried the experiment.

"Aw, my dear, why, what are 'ee talking about? You'm mazed, I reckon."

The soft answer did not have the desired effect. "I don't want none of your gammut, hand over that cloam or I'll knack 'ee stiff," roared the now thoroughly roused Saint.

"Come over and fetch your dratted cloam," replied St. Just, putting himself in a wrestling attitude, the effect of which was somewhat marred by the bulging outlines of the tea-set in his pockets.

St. Keverne wasted no more words, but pulled out one of his rocks and hurled it at his opponent. It was a splendid shot and took effect just where the fourth button of St. Just's waistcoat would have been had he worn a waistcoat.

Even a Saint could not stand the effect of a heavy rock on top of cold pasty and figgy fuggen. St. Just doubled up in silent agony for a minute. Then, as his breath came slowly back to him, he dragged the source of all his trouble, the famous tea-set, out of his pockets, flung it down in the grass, and bolted off towards Marazion as fast as his damaged diaphragm would allow him. The battle was over, St. Keverne had conquered.

The victorious Saint took his success very calmly. He simply picked up his recaptured "cloam" and trotted home to the peaceful little village that still bears his name. But before leaving the battle-field he emptied his pockets of the rocks he had brought.

"And there they stand until this day to witness if I lie" and anyone who travels from Breage to Marazion may see them on the left hand side of the road.

And as a further proof of the truth of the legend, they are of an entirely different kind of stone to that of the neighbourhood they stand in; you must go to Crowza Down before you find any like it.

Although these rocks have been removed several times for agricultural purposes, yet the next morning always finds them back in their old place. And the name of this place is Tre-men-keverne.

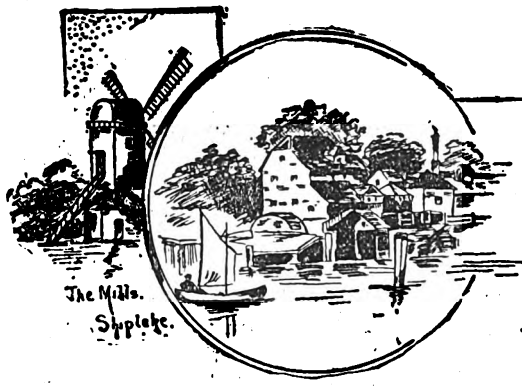
Public opinion was so bitter against St. Just that he decided to leave home for a little while and went on a mission to the Saxons.

The chronicles do not state how many converts he made, but judging from the manners and customs of the modern Saxon, his mission seems to have been remarkably successful.

He returned home to end his days in peace, however, and died very much respected by all who knew him (St. Keverne excepted) in the year of grace 627.

R. H. Watson.

Digitized by Google



By Right of Conquest.

MISS TERRENCE, going down the road, watched the girl who was coming towards her.

There were three men with the girl, and only Lancaster was with Miss Terrence. However, as he was all the world to her, she was content. They met in front of Captain Lansing's quarters.

Lansing was a cynic who observed his kind and told the result of his observations. Such are deservedly unpopular, but command appreciative audiences that are the envy of the good-hearted. It was to an audience of the sort that he recounted the meeting, the same afternoon, when the band stopped playing and the invading hosts from the town had departed.

"Dorothy Terrence," he began, settling back to temporary repose, "Dorothy Terrence came up the road. She had Lancaster with her, and she was looking happy. Miss Leeds—the banker's daughter, you know—came down the road. She had Kent, and Dartmoor, and Fergusson with her, and she was looking like a celestial being.

"They were both dressed in white—but there was a difference. Mrs. Lansing says it lay in a silk foundation. Be that as it may, there was a wonderfully made hat, all drifts and mists, and sprays of white, on the head of Miss Leeds, and a fluffy-all-round sort of sunshade over that.

"Dorothy saw Miss Leeds from afar, but the latter did not see Dorothy. They came together in front of my quarters—'and I was there.' Dorothy moved to one side. It was her instant attitude, and I fear, prophetic. The woman who steps aside can always stay there. But all might have gone well, and this story might never have been told, if Kent had not indulged his vulgar propensity for introductions.

"Miss Leeds bestowed a sweet and transitory smile upon Miss Terrence; but Lancaster is not the best-looking fellow in the county for nothing. If any of you happen to share my good fortune of knowing her, you will understand what happened when she turned her eyes upon him with a trick she has of seeming to look into one's very soul. She has the most beautiful voice imaginable, and she brought that into play also. Dorothy stood it as long as she could, and then she tried to get him away. He never even heard her. If Miss Leeds had not gazed soul-searchingly at him, and told him that she must be going, but would see him at the ball, he doubtless would be standing there still, with Dorothy anxiously watching him. It will be worth going to the hop to see developments."

* * * * *

Lancaster stood at the door of the dressing-room and watched Miss Leeds, while he waited for Dorothy.

He watched her as the huddling feminine mass made way for her at the mirror and she stood unchallenged, leisurely touching her glimmering brown hair and pinning a great white rose upon her shoulder.

Dorothy waited at his side for fully five minutes before he saw her. Then she laughed mockingly up into his face, and wished that her laughter might have been a blow.

As soon as he could leave her he went running and sliding across the floor where Miss Leeds stood at bay before a besieging group. She was backed against the wall, and a decoration formed of swords was just above her head.

"There are only twenty dances," she kept repeating, "and I never divide."

Lancaster took two of his fellow-officers by the shoulders and put them out of his way. Miss Leeds looked into his eyes and smiled as, it seemed to him, no woman had ever smiled before. She put her card into his hand.

"The two with the crosses are the ones I promised you," she said. And as she had promised and he had asked nothing, his heart beat high with triumph.

Not that it was a case of love at first sight. He was in love with Dorothy. But the most faithful of men may pay the court she expects to a belle, and may allow himself to be flattered by her marked favour.

He could honestly, then, and for several weeks afterwards, give Dorothy the comfort she sorely needed, and say that he did not even think Miss Leeds beautiful. "She has style and charm," he passed judgment, "but not beauty. And she is a flirt." He meant that Miss Terrence should understand how entirely he abhorred that.

"Did she try to flirt when you called upon her?"

He had made a point of confessing the call directly it was made, and he thought it tactless of Dorothy to dwell upon it. He shrugged his shoulders. "She does that with every man."

It was a truth which he fully appreciated, but its feeble light no longer fell upon the path of duty when the time came that the sun of Miss Leeds's countenance shed its glow upon the highway of inclination. And yet she did her best to make it clear to him.

"Now, listen to something I mean to tell you," she said to him. She set down her tea-cup and leant towards him, with her elbows upon her knees and her chin between her soft, pink palms. Her eyes were looking straight into his, and they filled his heart with anticipation.

Digitized by Google

"Do you know that this is a risky game we are playing, and that we have been playing it for all it is worth this last fortnight or so?"

Lancaster knit his brows.

"It is not worth while to pretend you don't understand. We both know exactly what I mean. But I want to be sure we both know that it is only a game. I am not in earnest, and you must not be."

He gazed at her, speechless.

"I suppose you are thinking that the suggestion of serious intentions might come first from you," she said; "that may be your way of looking at it, but it is not mine. I don't care to let you have anything to reproach me with. I have had enough of that in the past. I am a hopeless flirt, you know. I go into the thing for the fun there is in it, and it is only fair to warn you."

She leant back in her chair and fell to watching the passers-by in the street and to biting at a piece of sugar, meditatively.

"If you will accept matters that way, we can have a very good time; if you don't, I have warned you; and the consequences—if there are any—must be on your own head."

Lancaster laughed rather weakly. "I accept the terms," he said. "It is understood that this is only a flirtation."

Which he explained to Dorothy at much length, but which she would not understand, and was so unreasonable about it as to break her engagement. Lancaster was deeply aggrieved and rather more deeply relieved. But it made one fact plain to him; that he was seriously in love with a girl who frankly told him that he was no more to her than a score had been before, than scores might be thereafter. And it was all in vain that he tried to change her.

"I warned you quite fairly," she reminded him. "I warned you," Miss Leeds repeated, "and nobody has suffered but yourself, unless"—she glanced at him with a quizzical little smile—"unless there was another girl?"

"There was another girl," he answered.

She shrugged her shoulders tolerantly. "That was to have been expected. Most problems of the heart are in the rule of three."

He frowned angrily and his lips curved in contempt. "Are you absolutely heartless? Have you no pity for her?"

"Not a great deal. If you were the sort to desert her in a fortnight for a girl who made not the slightest effort to win you, and who told you that she didn't love you, I think, upon the whole, that she is rather well rid of you."

Lancaster was biting his lips, and he was very angry. "She is a better woman than you," he said.

"That may be. But still," she laughed good-naturedly, "do you think I am bad enough for you to be passing judgment upon me?"

"I do; for you are doing the thing in a cold-blooded way, and I—I," he said despondently "have lost my head."

She smiled into his eyes. "You don't want to do that. It is such a handsome head. Lose your heart—it is not worth nearly so much."

He turned and faced her squarely. "I am likely to lose more than that," he burst out suddenly; "I am likely to lose my life."

"Oh! come," she said, "you are not contemplating falling on the point of your sword, or drowning yourself, or superinducing galloping consumption, are you? I have had men do a number of things for me, but never quite that."

"I am not contemplating doing any of those. I may be a good deal of a fool, but not enough of one to put an end to myself for a woman who cares nothing for me."

"Yet that has been done," she suggested.

"What I meant was, and what I intended to tell you when I asked you to come to-day, was that I am going to the Soudan. I have volunteered for service."

"When do you leave?" she asked coolly.

"The day after to-morrow. And now I am going to ask you to promise me something."

"If it is not something I cannot promise."

"Not that. I shall leave that until I come back—if I do come back. If I do not—in short, if I am killed"—she gave a little shudder; he saw that she did, and repeated—"if I am killed, I shall leave orders that my most treasured possession shall be sent to you."

"Do you mean your horse?"

"I mean the horse. It will make me as happy as it would seem I am meant to be, to know that if I die you will have her, and will ride her, and be kind to her. For you are fond of her, too."

Miss Leeds knitted her brows and considered. "And if I should not?" she said.

"She shall not go to any one else. I will have Dartmoor shoot her on the day that he hears my death confirmed."

Miss Leeds switched at the skirt of her habit. "Is there no one else who is fond of her also?"

"No," he answered.

"But that other girl you told me of?"

There flashed back upon Lancaster's memory how Dorothy had been wont to stand with her arms round the arched black neck, and her cheek against the warm, soft nose; how the mare had followed her tamely, as she would follow no other but himself. Then Miss Leeds turned the sun of her questioning eyes upon him. They were serious now, and their gentle light scattered the mists of memories. Dorothy only valued the horse for the master's sake, and the master is no longer anything to her.

"Will you do as I ask?"

A little ironical smile, the smile of an easy-going cynicism, curled her lips. "Unto the victor belong the spoils. Yes, if anything happens to you, I will take the horse. But you must not be rash. I believe I prefer your safety to it."

Three months afterwards, Miss Leeds, bending forward to stroke the glossy neck of the black mare that had belonged to Lieutenant Lancaster, turned and glanced up into the face of the man who was riding beside her.

"Who was that girl you bowed to near the gates—the one with the big sad eyes?"

"It was Dorothy Terrence," he told her. "Lancaster used once to be engaged to her."

"No wonder then she looked at me reproachfully."

She tried to laugh, but the laughter broke and she grew white as she set the mare into a gallop.

"There may, you know—" she called to him, mockingly, above the clatter of the hoofs—"there may lurk the adder of remorse among the victor's spoils."

G. Eaton.

Digitized by Google

The Duel in the Salon.

AN INCIDENT IN THE CAREER OF A SOLDIER OF FRANCE.

A.M.

"Peste!" exclaimed de Crenan, making a gesture of impatience. "The gossips have had it their own way for twenty years, gentlemen; but if I must blab, I would rather two listeners like yourselves than a score like the cacklers of the Court or the idlers of the guardroom.

"Know then, mes amis, that 'twas dealt by a woman, and of all the wounds I bear is the only one which has had to go unavenged."

The blow doubtless had been aimed at the Chevalier's life, since it was between the neck and the shoulder; but the weapon had been held in awkward hands, and while failing to inflict the fatal wound, had deprived the Chevalier of the use of his left arm.

"Yes, gentlemen, it came from the hand of a woman; and, ma foi! after twenty years, I will say a dainty hand too, though——"

The sentence was completed by an expressive shrug of the Chevalier's shoulders.

"But fill your glasses, friends, for in the telling I'll warrant the story will prove dryer than it was in the doing; when, morbleu! I sweated like a bull and bled like a pig.

"It was nigh upon three weeks after the beating we gave the Spaniards at Rocroi that I arrived in Paris from Italy. I had obtained leave from Turenne.

"The Cardinal delayed to sign the patent confirming the right conceded me by Chavigny, to cut wood in the great forest between Poligny and Dôle.

"One evening towards the end of July, I was passing through the west gallery of the Palais when someone plucked me by the sleeve. Turning, I saw La Porte, first valet to the King.

"He had withdrawn from his doublet a letter, tied about with scarlet thread and secured with a broad seal. Leaning towards me he whispered a few words in my ear.

"When I found myself in the street, it struck me that I had engaged too quickly in an enterprise wherein I was nowise concerned. My consent to become La Porte's messenger had involved me in a plot against the Cardinal.

"So, while the clocks of the Faubourg were yet striking nine, I was ringing at the great gate of the Hôtel de Chevreuse.

"The Duchess received me in her boudoir. Evidently she was expecting a communication. But while she dallied to break the seal, she bestowed on me a glance full of piercing inquiry, and directed her Chamberlain to take charge of me till such time as the answer would be ready.

"Food was set before me, and wine; but my appetite was nigh spoilt by finding myself an object for the curiosity of a posse of ill-looking fellows, who, under pretext of searching for a comrade, entered the apartment, and after staring at me much longer than was agreeable, departed muttering together.

"At the end of an hour Madame sent for me.

"'You will remain in the Hôtel, monsieur, till morning,' said she, addressing me with great suavity. 'The streets are not safe after dark,' and with an imperious gesture of the hand she dismissed me.

"Some weeks after my journey to the Rue Dominique I had returned from the Palais after one of my fruitless interviews with the chief lackey of the minister, and sitting over my supper at Cormier's, I decided that the camp would agree better with my health than the Court.

"Calling for another bottle I began turning over the situation in my mind.

"As I lingered over the flagon, the sound of rough jesting and loud laughter reached me across the room.

"Presently, I could distinguish a voice mildly protesting that he was only a poor cloth merchant from Flanders, who was playing simply for amusement till monsieur le capitaine challenged him; and, having lost, doubled the stake and asked for his revenge.

"'Believe me, gentlemen,' the man ran on, 'le capitaine is mistaken. Firm play, a level head, and a fair knowledge of the game is all the magic I have used. I am just an honest dealer in cloth from the town of Douay in Flanders seeking to sell my wares to the merchants of your good city of Paris.

"'Parbleu!' continued the mild voice. 'It is not I you should blame, monsieur; it is Dame Fortune, who, being a woman, has turned her back on the old love to show her face to the new.

"'To-day, monsieur, the game has run for the wand, to-morrow it may run for the sabre.'

"I strode up to the edge of the crowd to get a look at the speaker.

"He caught me peering over the shoulder of a big Burgundian in cross belt and jackboots, who had just entered the tavern and was attracted to the table by the noise.

Digitized by Google

"While I was still wondering what it might mean, I heard my name called. Turning about, I saw a man in dark livery holding in his hand a letter.

"The letter was superscribed 'To the Chevalier de Crenan at the hostelry Le Cormier near St. Eustache,' and was sealed with black wax.

"At the same instant there was a movement at the table. The cloth merchant had risen. 'De Crenan?' he was saying, 'The Chevalier de Crenan? Surely it must be the gallant gentleman who rode with me two years ago from Cambray to Rheims, when but for his protection I should have fallen into the hands of the spadassins who infest the road.'

"In another moment he had joined me.

"'What is the meaning of the farce?' I whispered.

"'In good time, Chevalier,' he rejoined, 'in good time,' adding in undertones, wi h a glance at the man in livery, 'Does he wait for an answer?'

"Withdrawing to a corner I broke the seal.

"'If monsieur the Chevalier de Crenan' ran the missive 'desires to employ his sword in honourable service—to succour France and win distinction, he will follow the messenger who brings this letter.'

"I raised my eyes. The man was watching the big Burgundian who was showing off some fencing feat. I beckoned my friend the cloth merchant.

"'Lieutenant Clermont,' said I, 'we are old comrades. Doubtless you have some excellent reason for this disguise—'

"'The best in the world, Chevalier—'

"'Well, I will hear the story in a moment, but for the present do me the favour to read this.'

"'Ha—ha! my dear Chevalier,' chuckled the Lieutenant, returning me the letter. 'You want my opinion, eh? Well, there's either woman or war in it mon ami,' he continued, with an imperceptible shrug of the shoulders.

"'I had decided to-night,' said I, 'to quit Paris for Amblemont. Certes my sword hangs loose in the scabbard, and is always at the service of France; but I would fain know who purposes to employ it.'

"'Yon fellow is keeping his eye on us, Chevalier,' interposed the Lieutenant. 'I trow he suspects me of knowing better how to handle a long sword than an ellwand.'

"'Seriously, Clermont,' said I, 'can you advise me?'

"'You know my complexion, de Crenan. Ma foi! now that I've filled my purse from the pocket of that young sprig of le Ferrand's, my hand itches for the hilt again. I shall only have to provide myself with a horse and boots, mon ami; and if you've stomach for the venture we'll take the field in company, mon camarade.'

"'Your sword?' I inquired.

"'Is here, monsieur,' and he tapped significantly a roll of cloth, which he carried in his character of merchant of Flanders.

"'Very good then, Lieutenant,' said I, 'it wants still some minutes to ten. At the first stroke of the hour we will bid master "Chien" show the way. Meanwhile, my friend, you shall tell me what brings you in this guise.'

"Calling the messenger, I flung a coin upon the table, bade him order a cup of wine, and be ready to leave when he heard St. Eustache chime for the hour.

"'You must know, Chevalier,' began the Lieutenant, 'that at Tonnerre I fell into bad hands, and, to be brief, I reached Paris minus my horse and riding-boots, and with but two beggarly crowns at the bottom of my pocket. But wit and good judgment coming to my assistance, I converted the crowns into pistoles and myself into an honest Flanders merchant.

"'At Cormier's, I knew the company I should meet. I knew that Lieutenant Clermont of the Grey Musketeers would be less likely to fill his pouch than a booby of a cloth merchant from Douay in Flanders.

"'I began with staking single crowns, which I lost, and ended as you saw, with a hundred pistoles, which I won; and that, Chevalier, is the whole story,' concluded the Lieutenant with a roguish twinkle in his eye, 'and there is St. Eustache preparing to strike, and your man making ready to leave.'

"We rose on the instant and followed the man out.

"Proceeding along the Rue des Prouvaires we took the direction of the Louvre.

"Clermont, elated with his winnings and prompted by the prospect of an adventure in front of him, struck at once into a merry tale.

"We were both laughing at the device by which the Abbess of Chelles outwitted the Cardinal, when suddenly the roll of cloth which ensheathed my companion's blade was struck from beneath his arm, while a blow from the butt of a musket was dealt him between the shoulders. At the same instant I felt myself seized from behind by two powerful arms, which gripped me firmly by the wrists, while I was pushed forwards towards a coach that came out of a side street, and drew up at the junction of the thoroughfares.

"Hearing the clash of steel, I managed by great effort to turn my head. Clermont had recovered his weapon and was engaged with the big Burgundian.

"At that moment I was persuaded that I had seen the fellow exchanging signals with the messenger at Cormier's. I just caught the glint of a whirling sword, before a cowl, pulled roughly over my head, effectually blindfolded me; and, dragged along by half-a-dozen vigorous arms, I was thrust into the coach in which the men must have been concealed.

"As soon as they had me inside, the horses set off at a trot. My wrists were secured with small cords, and the cowl was removed; but the window-lattice being up, I was unable to distinguish the features of my captors.

"In what direction were we going? The Bastille? Vincennes? The grated windows, the enormous walls, the frowning turrets rose before me.

"I wondered what had become of Clermont. I sought for the motive which should explain the action. I could discover nothing. Then again I saw Madame's face peering diligently into mine.

"At last unable to bear it longer, I determined to ask whither they were taking me.

"'Gentlemen,' I said, in as careless a tone as I could muster. 'Be so good at least as to inform me at whose orders I am arrested.'

"A surly voice made answer:

"'Monsieur must remain silent, otherwise monsieur will compel us to use the gag.'

"Having no desire to taste the 'pear,' I obeyed the hint, for at the first sound of the fellow's voice a cold sweat broke out upon me.

Digitized by Google

"Where had I heard that voice before? I had laughed then, I remembered. Open danger had no terror for me.

"Three years before, when serving in the guards of the Prince de Condé, I had received orders to follow and overtake a certain person who had left Paris for Nanci with letters for the Duc de Lorraine. These letters I was to bring back.

"The man was said to be accompanied by only a single comrade; and, as I was instructed to take with me four men, it seemed there would be little difficulty in accomplishing the task.

"I came up with the quarry at a hamlet some few leagues beyond Meaux; but instead of having only two men to deal with, there were four, and as one of my knaves had cast a shoe at Lagny we were equally matched. There was nothing for it but to fall on, and singling out the Duke's courier, which I did from the description furnished me in Paris, I rode straight at him. So sudden was the onset that he was unhorsed in a twinkling; and sword at throat I demanded the letters he was carrying to the Duc de Lorraine. With an oath he denied that he bore any letter or that he served the Duke.

"I proceeded to search him; he sneering the while and telling some tale of the Duke's messenger having passed through Meaux three hours before.

"Calling to one of my men who was searching the fellow's saddle-bags, I bade him rip up the saddle. But the rascal at that instant reaching for his cap which had fallen from him as he came to the ground, I made a snatch at it. The change in the rogue's countenance told me I had secured the prize. The letters were concealed in the lining.

"Unfortunately, as it fell out, the man carried other letters than the billet doux of Madame Vernet, and these also came into the hands of the Prince de Condé.

"But leaving almost immediately to join the King's forces in Italy, matters of greater moment thrust the Prince's affairs out of mind.

"All that it has taken so long to tell flashed through my brain in a single instant. The man I had pulled from his horse beyond Meaux, was the man whose voice had replied to me out of the depths of the carriage.

"Whilst I was still trying to digest the discovery, the coach stopped. Three raps given upon the panel were replied to, the cowl was hastily thrust over my head, and the coach went rumbling on through another street. Presently it stopped a second time, the door was flung open and I was bidden to alight.

"Passing through a wicket in dead silence, we traversed a large courtyard, eventually reaching the foot of a flight of stairs which I was bidden to mount. At the top we seemed to come out on a sort of gallery.

"Suddenly a bell sounded close at hand. The cords which bound my wrists were removed. I was hurried along. The hood was pulled from my head, and I found myself in a small ante-chamber lighted by a solitary candle. With me were four men at arms, whose faces for all they told might have been cast in metal. At the same moment a slip door opening noiselessly in the wall disclosed a vast salon beyond.

"My guards motioned me forward, the door closed silently behind us; two of the men posting themselves in front of it, while their comrades escorted me to a long narrow table on which six candles of perfumed wax were burning in silver candlesticks. Across the further end of the chamber was stretched a heavy curtain of purple damask. I had just reached the table, when, the curtain parting in the middle, two cavaliers in masks advanced into the room.

"'Chevalier,' said the taller of the two, addressing me without preface or apology. 'I have questions to ask. Be careful how you answer. Do you remember a journey which a certain gentleman in the guards of the Prince de Condé undertook on a night in the year 1640?'

"'Pardon, monsieur,' I replied. 'Is it forbidden to know in whose presence I have the honour of standing?'

"Now I was satisfied that the man who had spoken was not the Duc de Lorraine; moreover, from the elegance of the hands as well as by the diminutiveness of the daintily shod feet, I was convinced that his companion was a woman.

"'It matters nothing. Answer the question.'

"'I remember,' I answered shortly.

"'At Meaux you robbed a courier of his letters?'

"'As a soldier, monsieur, I obeyed——'

"'You trifle with the question,' he broke out fiercely. 'When you performed that service for your employer, Chevalier, you condemned an unfortunate son of la belle France to a dungeon in Angoulême'—I knew then that he was de Châteauneuf—'and imperilled the life of a woman powerful enough to be feared by the great Cardinal.'

"'The correspondence of Madame Vernet with the Duc de Lorraine might possess some interest for the Prince de Condé; but the letters of Marie Michou were not exactly billets-doux, Chevalier.'

"'Marie Michou?' said I. 'You mean the Duchess de Chevreuse, Marquis?'

A slight movement came from the slim, silent form at the table.

"'Monsieur,' I said, impressed that the silent mask was no other than Madame de Chevreuse herself. 'I had lately the honour to be the bearer of a message to the Duchess——'

"'And Madame failed not to afford you the protection of her roof.'

"'My comprehension must be at fault, Marquis.'

"'I will assist it. Grosjean, Lorraine's courier was in the courtyard. Is that enough, monsieur?'

"'Madame may very well have had her reasons,' I answered sulkily. 'I came from La Porte.'

"'Diable! Does the Duchess then owe you protection?—a cut-throat in the pay of Condé. Pasque-dieu!' he thundered, 'the Duchess owes you nothing—nothing monsieur, but a short shrift and a——' he stopped abruptly, and glared at me through the eye-holes in his mask. 'Listen, monsieur' he began again, 'the overtures between the Palais and the Hôtel de Chevreuse are broken off, and Madame finds herself to-day in gravest peril. The letters of Marie Michou, which the Chevalier de Crenan handed to his master the Prince de Condé, are in the private cabinet of Cardinal Mazarin. They must be recovered.'

"'Pardon me, monsieur, if I fail to comprehend.'

"'Ganache!' he cried, stamping his foot. I remained silent.

"'Monsieur,' continued the Marquis, speaking thickly. 'The Hôtel has failed. The Palais has triumphed. At any moment Madame may receive a lettre de cachet.'

"'Monsieur, you misapprehend——'

"'Not at all—not at all!' he interrupted. 'The letters must be recovered.'

"'Nom de Dieu!' I exclaimed. 'How——?'

"'Will you swear, on the breviary?' he shouted.

Digitized by Google

'Will you swear, monsieur, to obey faithfully the instructions Madame will——'

"'No, monsieur,' I said stoutly, wishing to end the business. 'I obey none but the King. I have no reason to love his eminence; but I refuse to soil my hands for an enemy of the Prince.'

"'Varlet!' he roared. 'Will not the mischief you have done content you, but you must add insult to injury? Madame——'

"'I spoke of the Marquis de Châteauneuf, monsieur,' answered I coldly.

"'—Ssh! The Duchess, madman! The Duchess! The Marquis asks nothing from you. Does the Chevalier de Crenan refuse reparation to a lady?'

"'Duchess or Marquis, methinks 'tis the same thing, monsieur.'

"The silent figure clutched him by the arm.

"'Un outrage' he exclaimed hotly. 'You must fight, Chevalier. Nom d'un chien! You shall beg your life of Madame upon your knees.'

"'At your service, Monsieur le Marquis,' said I, bowing. 'but your people having deprived me of my sword, and favoured me with these marks of attention'—I showed my wrists still red and swollen from the pressure of the cords—'I am sorry I cannot oblige you at the moment. To-morrow, monsieur, I shall be pleased to give you a meeting.'

"'To-morrow!' he sneered. 'You make very free with to-morrow. Here—and now, if you please, monsieur.'

"'Men do not fight duels in a salon, and by candle-light,' I answered with a touch of scorn.

"'We will set the fashion, Chevalier.'

"'Or without seconds and in the presence of a woman, Marquis.'

"'Morts diables!' he roared, and unlocking a cabinet flung upon the table three rapiers.

"'Choose, monsieur, choose!'

"'And if I refuse?'

"'I will have you beaten by the lackeys and dragged through the kennels.'

"'Pardon, monsieur!' I said tartly, picking up a weapon at hazard.

"Across the table the Marquis eyed me keenly.

"'We are not here to amuse ourselves, Chevalier.'

"'You keep the business waiting, Marquis,' said I, bringing my sword to the guard.

"'You are in a great hurry to be killed,' he rejoined in his gibing fashion.

"'It is for that purpose I have been brought here,' I retorted. 'You are well served, Marquis, by your cowardly gang of hired assassins. But I am a soldier, monsieur; and a soldier does not betray the man whose bread he has eaten and whose badge he has worn. You have the advantage of me, Marquis.'

"'Mon Dieu!' cried a shrill voice in anger. 'But I will stop the mouth of this polisson,' and snatching up the weapon which lay in waiting on the table, the silent mask rushed in upon me with avid impetuosity.

"But in a twinkling the Marquis had planted himself in front of me; while I, mistrusting the intentions of the lady, retreated till I had the protection of the wall at my back.

"We lunged and parried and returned upon each other.

"The sweat stood in great drops upon my brow. My wrist, stiff and weak from the bonds which had bound it, burnt as if clasped by a bracelet of fire.

"The Duchess followed each pass with glittering eyes.

"Once, I slit his doublet, and I saw the rapier tremble in Madame's hand.

"Once, I pricked his forearm, and Madame made to run in on me; but the Marquis waved her aside.

"My wrist, which had lost its suppleness, was fast losing its power. I was no longer able to force down my opponent's blade far enough to give me a chance for his breast.

"I fought on doggedly, never taking my eyes off the other's point; but never doubting how the affair would end. I was not to escape.

"Within the apartment, all was silent, save for the clash of steel upon steel.

"My head, however, was full of strange noises—a confused medley of sounds. Whether penetrating from without or merely springing from the tension within, I was ignorant. The business in hand required all my attention.

"The next pass however brought the explanation.

"The Marquis, making a determined effort to run me through, suddenly staggered and fell, his weapon dropping from his grasp as he came to the floor—at the same instant the reflection of flames was seen through the curtained windows of the apartment, the crash of a thunderbolt broke over the hotel, and I was aware of a stinging sensation in my left shoulder. It was Madame's rapier.

"Doubtless, the Duchess supposed the Marquis to have fallen to my weapon; whereas, he had received a shock from the lightning which had fired the building.

"In a moment the chamber seemed to grow crowded. There was a sound of many voices. The north wing was in flames.

"I have a remembrance of hearing someone say, 'Throw this canaille in the gutter.' Then I must have lost consciousness.

"When I came to myself I was in my old quarters at Cormier's. Clermont, who had beaten off the Burgundian, had found me, bleeding and senseless, on the causey of the Rue Dominique.

"I was nigh done for, but Youth—divine Youth, messieurs, denied the fall; and, on the last day of October we set out to join the King's army at Colmar.

"Gentlemen!—the flagon's empty."

H. Hunter.

Digitized by Google

Was He a Hero?

I knew Louis Mayne very well in the old student days when we used to take our meals together.

Louis had the deep eyes, the pale complexion, and the long and dishevelled hair of all those young men who came to town from the country to conquer glory.

He was a writer. I soon found his name in weekly journals and reviews, and then he began to write those short and exquisite sketches which have made his reputation. Thus five years passed, when I met him one day in the editor's office of a journal for which I worked.

Each of us was as much pleased as the other at thus meeting again; and after the first, "What! is that you? Is that you?" we stood facing each other, shaking hands and exposing, in a laugh of cordial delight, our teeth, which in old times we used to exercise on the same crust of poverty. He had not changed. He had not even sacrificed his long hair, which he threw back with the graceful movement of a horse who tosses his mane.

Only he had the clear complexion and calm eye of a contented man, and his slim figure was clad in most fashionable costume.

"We won't drift apart again, will we?" said he affectionately, taking me by the arm; and he led me to the Embankment gardens, where the April sun gilded the young leaves of the trees.

Ah, happy day! How we exhausted the "Don't you remember?" "Don't you remember the fried eggs which tasted of straw, and the dreadful rice milk, the melancholy air of your landlady, and the German who used to pawn his watch every three months?"

Those days of hardship for Louis were finished. He had from afar applauded my success, as I had watched his. But one thing I did not know, and that was that he had married a woman whom he adored, and that he had a charming little girl.

"Come and see them; you shall dine with me."

I let myself be persuaded, and he took me off to a pretty suburb, where he lived in a cottage among the trees. There everything made you welcome. No sooner had we opened the door of the garden than a young dog frisked about our feet.

"Down, Dick! He will soil your clothes."

But at the sound of the bell Mrs. Mayne appeared at the steps with her little daughter in her arms. An imposing and beautiful blonde, her well-moulded figure wrapped in a blue gown.

"Put on a plate more. I've an old friend with me."

And the happy father, caressing his little girl, showed me all over his establishment—the dining room, prettily decorated with freshly-cut flowers; the study abounding in books, with its window opening out on the green turf, so that a puff of wind had strewn with rose leaves the printers' proofs which were scattered on the table.

"This is only a beginning, you know. It wasn't so long ago that we were working for three halfpence a line."

And while I luxuriated under a blossoming Judas tree which I saw in the garden, Mayne, at ease in his home, had slipped into his working coat, put on his slippers, and, lying on his sofa, caught little Helen up in his arms to toss her in the air—"Houp la! Houp la!"

I do not remember ever to have had a more perfect impression of contentment. We dined pleasantly—two good courses, that was all; a dinner without pretence.

The charming wife presided with a bright smile, having her child by her side in a high chair. She spoke but little, but her sweet and intelligent attention followed our light and paradoxical chat, the good-humoured fooling of men of letters, and at the dessert she took a rose from the bouquet which ornamented the table, and placed it in her hair near her ear with supreme grace. She was indeed that lovely and silent friend whom a dreamer requires.

Digitized by Google

We took our coffee in the study—they intended to furnish the drawing-room very soon with the price of a story to be published by Levy; then, as the evening was cool, a fire of sticks and twigs was built; and while we smoked Mayne and I, recalling old memories, the mistress of the house, holding on her knees little Helen now ready for bed, made her repeat her evening prayers, which the little one lisped, rubbing her little feet together before the warm flame.

Little Helen.

We saw each other again, often at first, then less frequently, the difficult and complicated life of literary labour taking us each his own way. So the years passed. We met, shook hands. "Everything going well?" "Splend dly." And that was all. Then, later, I found the name of Louis Mayne but rarely in the journals and periodicals. "Happy man; he is resting," I said to myself, remembering that he was spoken of as having made a small fortune. Finally, last autumn, I learnt that he was seriously ill.

I hurried to see him. He still lived at the pretty suburb; but on this sombre day of the last of November the little house seemed cold, and looked naked among the leafless trees. It seemed to me shrunken and diminished, like everything that we have not seen for a long time.

The dog was probably dead, for his bark no longer answered the sound of the bell when I passed the little gate and entered the garden, all strewn with dead leaves where the night's frost had withered the last chrysanthemums.

It was not his wife—she was absent—it was Helen who received me—Helen who had grown to be a big girl of fourteen, with an awkward manner. She opened for me the door of her father's study, and brusquely lifting her great black lashes turned on me a timid and distressed glance.

I found Mayne huddled in an easy chair in the corner of the fireplace, wrapped in a sort of dressing-gown, with grey locks streaking his long hair, and by the cold, clammy hand which he reached towards me, by the pallid face which he turned upon me, I knew that he was lost.

Horrible. I found in my unhappy friend that worn and ruined look which used to strike us formerly among the poor Poles we used to see.

"Ah, well, old man, things are not going well?"

"Deucedly bad, my boy," he answered.

Mayne, looking at me, seemed to pity my efforts.

I was silent.

"Look," said he, pointing to his table; "see my desk. For six months I have not been able to write."

I made a new attempt to revive him. Die, at his age. Nonsense. He wasn't taking care of himself. He must pass the winter in the south; drink a good draught of sunlight. He could. He was easy in his money matters.

But he stopped me, putting his hand on my arm.

"Listen," he said gravely. "We have seen each other seldom, but you are my oldest, perhaps my best friend. You have proved me pen in hand. Well, I am going to tell you something in confidence for you to keep to yourself unless it may serve on some occasion to discourage the young literary aspirants who bring their manuscripts to you—always a praiseworthy action.

"Yes, I have been successful. Yes, I have been paid a shilling a line. Yes I have made money, and there in that drawer are a certain number of yellow, green, and orange papers from which a coupon is clipped every six months, and which represent £200 of income. It is rare in our profession, and to gain that poor hoard I have been obliged to imitate the unsociable virtues of a miser, know how to deny a jewel to my wife, a dress to my daughter. But at last I have that money. And often said to myself, if I should die their bread is assured, and here is a little marriage portion for Helen! And I was content—I was proud.

"But for all that, my boy, it is necessary that I should not linger. Sickness is expensive, and already it has been necessary to sell one or two bonds from that drawer. To seek the sunlight as you suggest, to bask like a lizard in the tropics, one more bond must go, and there would not be enough to last to the end if I should wait for seven or eight years more, now that I can no longer write. Happily there is nothing to fear. But what I have suffered since I have been incapable of writing, and have felt my hoard of gold shrink and diminish in my hand like the 'Magic Skin' of Balzac, is frightful. Now you understand me, do you not? and you will no longer bid me take care of myself."

Fifteen days later some thirty of us followed the hearse which carried Louis Mayne to the cemetery. It had snowed the day before, and Dr. Arnold, the old frequenter of painter's studios, the friend and physician of the dead man, walking beside me, called in his brusque voice—

"Very commonplace, but always terrible, the contrast; a burial in the snow—black on white. The funeral of the poor. Brr!"

At last we came to the edge of the grave. The place and the time were sad. Under a cloudy sky the yew trees, swayed by the wind, threw down their burdens of melted snow. The bystanders had formed a circle, and were watching the grave diggers, who were lowering the coffin by cords.

Suddenly, as the burial service began, Dr. Arnold seized me by the arm and whispered in my ear:

"You know that he killed himself?"

I looked at him with astonishment. But he pointed to the group in black, composed of a pretty widow and her daughter, who were sobbing under their long veils and clasping each other in a tragic embrace, and he added:

"For them. Yes, for six months he threw all his medicine in the fire, and designedly committed all sorts of imprudences. He confessed it to me before his death. I had not understood it at all—I, who had expected to prolong his life at least three years. The other night, when it was freezing cold, he left his window open, as if by forgetfulness, and was taken with bleeding at the lungs. Yes, that he might leave bread for those two women. The clergyman does not dream that he is blessing a suicide.

"But what of it, my good fellow? Mayne is in the paradise of the brave."

B. Lovell.

Digitized by Google

The Mysterious Letters.

HAVE you ever, on making a call, thought you had hung your hat up on the hall rack, and when leaving sought there vainly for the very hat which, perhaps, you were holding in your hand? If you have, you know how unpleasant this little trick of your brain jarred your reason, in spite of your voluntary apology that "it was only a mistake, a trifling, absent-minded mistake, after all."

It was all because of just such a little mistake on the part of Mrs. Starr, that foolish persons who postulate "marriage is a failure" used to point triumphantly at Starr and his wife.

Still, when they were joined together for better or for worse, no couple could have been more devotedly in love with one another than they were. This forms a rather sad, but, I think, profitable little story.

Now that the principals concerned are dead and gone, the physician who attended Mrs. Starr says I am at liberty to tell the tale. He laughs, as he is entitled to, at the construction I put upon the facts, but inconsistently evades sitting in judgment on the case.

Men remember Mrs. Starr as the beautiful Miss Snell, for her face in those days was a face that no man could quite forget. She was the most utterly ruthless coquette of her day. The family means, in her generation, had fallen far below what was necessary to keep up the prestige of the family name.

Her father and mother never ceased to lament that fact, and Miss Snell was dutifully impressed in her early girlhood with the fact that her beauty must win back the departed family glories by social achievements. How well it did everybody knows.

By a mere coincidence, among the persons chained by her smiles was a boy who did not have much of anything but a naval commission, some brass buttons, and a sword.

This business with the boy was quite unnecessary. Miss Snell had nothing to gain by winning the boy's love; still, she even went out of her way to do it. The boy avoided her because he knew she was unobtainable for him, and because the first time he looked into her eyes he knew, with but half a chance, he would love her very badly. Miss Snell knew it, too, but if the boy had not avoided her, she would not have done what she did.

She was engaged to another man at the time—it was her third—and she deliberately broke that engagement that she might be free to deal with the boy. This was most effectually accomplished.

He was a queer mixture of poet and sailor, the boy was, and Miss Snell was a little shocked at the tempest she invoked within him. There was something in his glorious avowal of love that made former protestations pale into insignificance. It carried her away for the moment, and she gave him her lips and she gave him her promise, knowing very well in her heart of hearts it was the old story of love on one side and submission on the other. But marriage on his pay was impossible, so the boy went off to his ship, and Miss Snell back to her triumphs in the social whirl of the city.

The letters that came to her from every port the boy's ship made, were rather remarkable. They were of a new species. The writer seemed to have an uncanny divination of everything the woman he loved did or thought. In spite of that, an immeasurable love breathed forth from every line. No man should write the things he wrote to any living woman.

At last a letter came from Honolulu that was so touching in its pathos, so abject in its devotion, and still so marvellously prophetic in its conception of Miss Snell's life, that she felt called upon to write him some truths. This was just about the time she met Starr, and fell a victim herself to the passion she had trifled with so often.

When the boy received her letter he went down to his quarters, and blew his brains out. For decency's sake the surgeon called it a pistol-cleaning accident, but he was brutal enough to send back a blood-splashed letter that he found all twisted up in the boy's hand to the woman who wrote it far away at home.

The night before the Starr-Snell nuptials Miss Snell did what all other girls would have done—religiously burnt all those fantastic, extravagant letters the boy had written her. It was rather peculiar that she found the red-stained letter which had been the boy's death warrant, and his last letter to her from Honolulu, lying together in her drawer apart from all the others, heaped carelessly in a compartment of her escritoire.

She did not remember putting them away among her laces and her bonbonnières, but there they were, so she took them over to the fire a little gingerly, and tossed them after their fellows into the dancing flames.

Then she sat down and watched them curl and crinkle in the eager, lapping flame, till the draught caught the feathery black ashes and carried them up the sooty chimney. Speculation on Miss Snell's thoughts at this time is, I think, entirely problematical.

Popular fancy has it that just before death, and just before marriage, one's thoughts grow rapt—abstracted, and that the faces of old loves, and the faces of old friends come to look in on one as they knew one in bygone days. So it is reasonable to suppose that, as Miss Snell languidly reposed in the glow of her bedroom hearth, among the faces that chased one another across her mental vision was the haggard, appealing face of the boy; this, however, it is not given to us to know.

The wedding on the following day was an event of social importance, and it came off with great éclat. But the crowds, and the music, and the flowers, and even the six charming Watteau shepherdesses with ribboned crooks, who were the bridesmaids, do not concern us here. Let us pass on.

Hardly had the couple returned from their wedding journey, when Starr called on the doctor, and told him he was worried about the health of his wife.

"Mrs. Starr," he said, "was in an unaccountably nervous and hysterical condition, and was growing more wan and hollow-eyed as each day went by."

The man of medicine went and looked at her, found that this was true, prescribed the usual remedies, and continued to visit her occasionally; but he did not learn the cause of her trouble till some time had expired, and, when he did learn, it was from Mrs. Starr's own lips that part of it came, Starr himself not only corroborating in general all she said, but adding a great deal more.

Digitized by Google

The first evening of their honeymoon, when unpacking her things, Mrs. Starr was rather unnerved to find all covered up among the dainty feminine belongings in the tray of her trunk the two identical love letters that she had watched burn and fly up the black chimney flue. Unexplainable as their presence was, she could only put it down to a mistaken impression on her part, and she made certain to destroy them this time beyond question or doubt.

Into a gas jet she hastily thrust them, and a second time she watched the flame creep over the unwelcome letters, turning them into two charred black curls which fell in broken flakes on the floor, and there were ground into impalpable dust by two angry little heels. That this was not witnessed by her husband is almost unnecessary to add.

When Mrs. Starr found the very same letters in the very same place a day or so after, a thrill of alarm chilled her through and through. With sickening dread she tore them into a hundred fragments and threw them fearfully out of her window into the hurly-burly of a winter storm.

Although she became positively ill from her scare at the supernatural reappearance of the letters, she did not tell her husband about the matter, but, woman-like, tried to pray herself into the belief that it was only a mistake after all—a mere common, ordinary, everyday mistake. And this was wrong.

In a short time the couple returned, and Mrs. Starr's condition so alarmed her husband that he called on her physician. She kept the cause of her trouble entirely secret, but how often she found and destroyed those two mysterious letters during this time is not known.

Physically she rapidly grew worse, though her husband showered on her a wealth of loving care and affection. Her peace of mind and her happiness were fast becoming utterly destroyed.

One night Starr awoke, and in the half light he saw the white-robed figure of his wife on her knees before an open drawer. She seemed to be holding something in her hands, which she was regarding with a look of terror.

"What is wrong, sweetheart? Does anything trouble you?" asked Starr soothingly.

At the sound of her husband's voice the woman carried her hands to her face and rose. Then she tottered over towards him, repeating mechanically, in a low whisper of despair:

"Oh, Heaven! Oh, Heaven!"

When she reached her couch she sank back on her pillows, choking with dry, tearless sobs.

Starr rose and turned on the light, and looked to see what had alarmed his wife; in vain, for there was nothing there. All that a loving man could do to compose and quiet her, he did.

In the lull that followed she told him something—not all—of the strange reappearances of those letters, just enough to startle him and arouse his curiosity; but he was wise enough at the time not to ask to see them or ask anything else about them. Nevertheless, he determined to watch very carefully for their next manifestation and use drastic means for their disposal.

Mrs. Starr had found that attempts to destroy those letters were utterly useless, for they always came back, and besides, hating and loathing them as she did, they began to exert over her mind a marvellous fascination. Though she quivered when she saw the muddy red blots on her letter, she craved to look into it, and she was no more content with a mere glance at its Honolulu post mark than at the neat letter-head of the other. So she commenced to read them—lingeringly, feeling all the while that at every word she read she was driving another nail into the coffin of her happiness.

This harrowing desire to contemplate those letters came to her most often at night, and then she would rise from her husband's side, steal over to her drawer, and mumble away in the dim yellow light the things the Boy wrote to her before she killed him.

Of course, her husband saw her doing this one night, and he went over to her with loving caresses, which, strange to say, she recoiled from as if they had been blows.

Perhaps that was why Starr foolishly asked her why she was standing there muttering those nonsensical things. In answer she held her hands in front of his face—just exactly as you would hold a letter for a person to read—and Starr saw there was absolutely nothing in her hands; but he did not say so to her.

He asked her quietly to read the letter to him, and thereby wrought his own and her undoing.

Mrs. Starr read the letters to him—both of them—from date to superscription, in a low metallic monotone, for all the world as if the real writing were in her hands.

The letter from the boy came first, and before two lines were read Starr knew—what only a few people did know—that his wife had given her pledge and her kisses to the boy long before she gave them to himself.

The boy said: "he went down on his knees in his cabin at night and prayed that he might die, if that would only make the happiness of the woman he loved." Oh, that was not all he said. He wrote things that it is better not to mention or print. And he told of long, clinging kisses given and taken, "kisses that had taught him why it is the world is sometimes bartered for a woman's kiss."

It was too much for poor Starr—too much for any husband to hear from any wife's lips—and because it was only a phantom, a memory, that could not be explained, it seemed ever so much the worse.

When Mrs. Starr finished reading her reply to the boy's letter, her husband had collapsed, and was only semi-conscious. Then she bent down and electrified him by pointing with her finger to certain round brown splashes, unseen by him, which she whispered were "Blood! blood!"

Starr gave a great cry and rushed out of the bedroom. Half-an-hour later, white and shaking, he told the doctor his wife was mad, and added, rather brokenly, that he felt he "could never bear to see her again."

Up to the very last Mrs. Starr continued to find those letters every day. She found them hidden under dainty, fragrant lingerie in her drawer, under her pillow at night, and sometimes even in the very bosom of the dress she wore. In agony she was doomed to read them over and over again, till she could read no more.

There are people who do not know why Starr and his wife drifted away from one another, and who are inclined to call Starr a brute.

But the saddest part of it all is this: for Starr's sake the woman would have gone on her hands and knees through all the world—so much I know.

E. Biggs.

Digitized by Google

A LIVING TOMB.

FOUR years ago I spent the summer in France. July found me in the Department of Calvados, Normandy, at a village near Caen, a mine of antiquities. The curé, Father Aloysius, showed me everything which he thought would interest a stranger. As some slight return for his kindness I asked him to lunch with me. We went to the hotel.

Very old, with snowy hair, and face as ruddy as a pippin of his province, my companion carried sunshine wherever he went. He had a cheery greeting for all, and it was easy to see that all venerated him.

"Yes, monsieur, my people know me," he said in answer to some remark. "Forty-seven years I have laboured among them. It is almost a lifetime. The church has called me often; my friends say I might have been a bishop, but I could not leave."

A group of men, excitedly gesticulating, stood round the hotel door. They came to meet us hurriedly.

"Have you heard, Father—have you heard?" they cried.

"No, my friends," he answered; "what is the news?"

Several spoke at once, but this is the gist of what they said:

"You know the old castle is sold? To a rich bourgeois—yes? The place is tumbling down—he will have it repaired. Pierre Valois and Jean Prudhomme went with their tools this morning—to take down some masonry. M. Grousset—the purchaser—he was there, too. They found a skeleton—in the wall!"

"Sacred Name!" cried the priest, white as a corpse. "At Vallon? No! Not a mile away? Impossible!"

"It is true."

Father Aloysius turned to me. He shook like a man with the ague.

"You will pardon me, monsieur? I must go at once. This is a great discovery. I will verify it and return."

He hastened away; I lunched alone.

It was four o'clock when he came back, still pale and very subdued.

"I have been rude," he said. "I crave again a thousand pardons. I could not tear myself away. Forty-seven years I have sought what chance has brought to light to-day. You shall hear.

"Forty-seven years ago I came to this village. I had been asked to take charge of it in the absence of the curé. It was my second night here—so dark one could not see one's hand. I was tired, I had been visiting the sick. I lay down in my soutane and slept. A loud knocking awoke me.

"'Who is there?' I cried.

"'Friends of the Church,' a voice answered.

"I opened the door; two men entered, tall and well-dressed. I could not see their faces, they wore masks.

"'Are you the curé?' said the man who had answered me—a foreigner by his accent.

"I explained.

"'No matter,' he said, 'one priest is as good as another. A man is dying; he wishes to receive absolution; will you go?'

"I hesitated. 'Will you explain why you wear those masks?' I said.

"He laughed. 'It is the simplest thing in the world—we do not wish to be recognised. Now will you go? Your poor will benefit.'

"'I am ready,' I replied.

"A carriage stood outside the door; my poor lamp revealed it. I entered it with the spokesman. The other mounted the box. Many times the carriage turned completely round.

"'Does your companion not know the way?' I asked.

"'It is very dark,' was the reply.

"I have been reminded of the circumstance, apparently trivial, to-day. At the time I expected nothing. I know now that the carriage was turned to confuse me. My companion was taciturn. He answered me 'no'; 'yes.'

"Many miles we travelled—twenty or more. Two hours we had journeyed when the carriage stopped in a paved yard.

"'We alight here,' said my companion.

"I followed him; the coachman descended. I could not see him, I could not distinguish the carriage.

"'Is it necessary to blindfold the priest?' he asked.

"'No,' was the reply.

"I was disquieted, but not afraid. A poor monk need not fear robbers.

"'Give me your hand,' said my fellow traveller.

"I obeyed. He led me along a passage between high walls; the sounds told me. We crossed another paved yard, and climbed a stone staircase. The apartment we entered was flagged. My guide halted.

"'The priest is here,' he said in a loud voice. I saw nothing. His voice echoed as if in an empty room of vast size.

"'Where is the dying man?' I asked.

"Stand close to the wall.'

"He placed me in position. Cold air struck my face—a draught. There was a cavity.

"'The priest is here,' my guide repeated.

"Then I heard another voice, very faint, as of a man near death. 'Is he alone?' it said.

"'No,' I answered. 'One of the men who brought me here stands before me.'

"The poor wretch sighed.

"'I will retire,' said my companion. His footsteps sounded like those of one walking in a vault. The dying man heard.

"'You are alone now,' he said.

"'Yes,' I answered; 'speak on.'

"He did so. 'Ah! monsieur. I thought I was dreaming.

"'I am near death. I need the last rites of the Church,' he said.

"'Confess your sins,' I answered.

"'My sins are trivial,' he returned. 'I would speak of a great crime. I occupy a cell twice the width of my body—I know not where. I am condemned to die of starvation—I know not why. I have never injured a fellow creature.'

"My blood boiled.

"'Speak on,' I repeated.

"'My name is Jules Davoust,' he resumed. 'I am of Caen, and well known. I was a happy man until I met Sophia Polinski, ay, afterwards I was happy. She is Polish, of noble family; so she told me. Ah! father, she is beautiful. I loved her—I love her still. She returned my passion. I am only a tradesman, but we were married; two months of bliss were mine. One day she came to me trembling. "Fly," she said, "fly at once!" She would not explain. I had my business, my little shop; I had done no wrong; I refused. That night she disappeared. Next day I received a note, written by her hand. She bade me meet her in the wood, at a secluded place known to us both. I went. She was not there. It was dark. I called her by name. Two men came up, seized and gagged me, forced me into a carriage, and brought me here. I am condemned without trial. My gaolers tell me that I must die, or a noble name will be dishonoured. There is nothing more. I was permitted to choose the manner of death. Aid me, if you can; but give me absolution now.'

Digitized by Google

"I absolved him. I bade him have courage. I assured him that he would be free in a few hours. My guide returned.

"'I have heard your words,' he said. 'You cannot aid him. If I thought you could, you would share his fate.'

"He took my hand, and led me to the carriage, entering with me. The coachman whipped his horses; they galloped. I pleaded for the poor man. My companion was dumb. I threatened him with the law. He answered not a word. I pictured the vengeance of an offended Providence; he was stone. I vowed to devote my life to the discovery and punishment of his crime; still not a word. But I have kept and will keep my vow. A faint grey light was growing in the east when we reached the curé's door. I alighted. A purse was thrust into my hand. The carriage disappeared.

"Two hours later the gendarmes were scouring the country. They discovered nothing. Seven days I passed visiting châteaux and houses to no purpose. Then I went to Caen. I found the home of Jules Davoust. Both he and his wife were missing. The neighbours described him, a very handsome man, incapable of committing a crime. His wife, they told me, was a beautiful woman with the air of a princess. She spoke French with a foreign accent, dressed in silk and satin and wore valuable jewels.

"The gendarmes wearied of the fruitless search, but I did not. I made my home here. I succeeded the curé. I mapped out the country and visited every château, save one, within a wide radius, every large house. Forty-seven years I have sought a clue. Come to the window."

I rose. Father Aloysius pointed to the old castle of Vallon, crowning a hill scarcely a mile distant.

"That is the château which I did not visit," he said. "It is so near, and I travelled many miles that night. There the tomb of Jules Davoust was discovered this morning. I have stood within it; it is a hole in the wall six feet high, by four wide. The stones behind which the poor wretch spoke to me bulged with the weight above, and the workmen pulled them down. The skeleton fell out. In my presence they replaced them. One stone, just the height of my head, was without mortar; it could have been removed easily. The two paved yards are there, the passage between the walls, the stone staircase, the big flagged room. I have no doubt at all. If the criminals are living they shall be brought to justice."

Twelve months afterwards I met Father Aloysius in Paris. He had just returned from Poland. An examination of the papers of the late owner of the château had resulted in the discovery that his grandfather had rented the place to a Polish gentleman who gave the name of Lubenski. The latter took it for a year, but at the end of six months apprised the proprietor that he no longer needed it.

"That is all we know," said the curé. "In Poland I learned nothing. Nor have the police been more successful."

"And the mystery is as far from being solved as ever?"

"Yes; I fear the truth will not be known until the day of judgment. I have imagined many things. The forty-eight years which have passed have been fruitful in curious reflections. I would dismiss the matter from my mind now if I could. But I fear that is impossible."

J. HARLAND.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 10 distribution must reach us by December 12th, addressed to The 10th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Seventh Distribution appears on page 760.

Digitized by Google

A Fight with Fever.

A STORY OF FLORIDA.

"MILLY, can't you make that child leave off crying? I must finish ironing, 'cos Miss Mary told me to be sure and have 'em done by four o'clock, and I know by the way the sun is shining in that door it ain't far from that now. Take him down under the oak tree by the road to quiet him." Sarah hardly looked up from her ironing board, where lay the daintiest and snowiest of white wrappers, receiving the finishing touches from her skilful iron.

The kitchen was at torrid heat. In the great chimney glowed the wood fire, with the smoothing irons heating in front. Overhead was the burning afternoon heat of that August sun. Sarah stopped her ironing just a moment and wiped the perspiration from her brow. "You ain't a bit like your mother, my girl, you're too slow."

Milly, the girl thus spoken to, a child about eleven years old, reluctantly rose and picked up the crying child. She went down the path to a large spreading oak tree, which cast its cool, refreshing shade over the dusty road. She deposited the baby on the parched grass and proceeded to gather up leaves and twigs for his amusement. His cries were soon turned into joyful chatter, thanks to the change from the hot kitchen to the shade and open air.

Soon Milly's attention was attracted by the approaching rumble of what she thought was a carriage, with tall black plumes all over it. It was a hearse. With open mouth and wide-stretched eyes, she gazed curiously on.

The driver came up under the mighty oak and checked the heated horses to a halt. He inquired of the child how far it was to Rugton.

"I say, my girl, run and bring me a drink of water from the house yonder. I am nearly perished."

Milly's astonishment lent wings to her usually dilatory feet.

She ran back to the house for the water, and while there saw that Sarah had finished ironing and was gone with the clothes.

The driver drank long and often from Milly's jug until his thirst was fully appeased. Again taking his seat, the panting horses were given a crack of the whip and the hearse soon passed out of sight, leaving Milly standing by the roadside enveloped in a cloud of dust.

In the meantime Sarah, with her basket of clothes, delivered the result of her labours to Mrs. Fort, or "Miss Mary," as she was lovingly called.

"I'll put away the clothes this evening, and you can come for your basket and money in the morning, Sarah."

"Yes, ma'am, that's all right."

After a long conversation Sarah started to go, but stopped at the door to say:

"Miss Mary, ain't you got none of them good preserve figs? I've been feeling uncommonly poorly to-day and want something to put a good taste in my mouth."

Mrs. Fort knew what that meant and gave to her bountifully from the delicacies of the larder. The woman had practically been reared in Mrs. Fort's family and was a privileged servant.

Since Mrs. Fort had been widowed she looked upon Sarah as more than a servant.

She had also become her trusted nurse.

Promptly the next morning Sarah went for her basket and money.

"Milly was telling me about a curious carriage stopping down by the big oak tree for the hosses to rest yistiddy. The man asked her for a drink of water."

"Why that must have been the hearse taking old Mrs. Tapley to her home to be buried."

Just then a tall, manly boy came running in and heartily gave Mrs. Fort a loving kiss.

It was Dan, her fifteen-year-old son.

"Mr. Meade says old Mrs. Tapley died of yellow fever. He just received a telegram from the place where she died. It has recently been pronounced epidemic there."

Digitized by Google

"Why, Sarah, if that is so, Milly and your baby will take it," said Mrs. Fort, who unselfishly always thought first of others.

Those who have never experienced yellow fever epidemic abroad can hardly realise the wild panic. All who can, flee as from certain death. Sorrow and fear overwhelm the land.

Young Dan Fort and Mr. Meade stood guard together one day.

But yellow fever moves majestically on, conquering and slaying thousands. Short quarantines are instituted on the public roads. All the men have to serve in turn at the picket.

It so happened that young Dan Fort and Mr. Meade stood guard together one day. Mr. Meade was known everywhere as a man fond of his drams.

"Dan, if you will drink plenty of whisky, you won't have yellow fever," said Meade passing his flask over to Dan.

Dan refused.

"Why, you're a fool, boy. Right here in the face of yellow jack, to refuse to drink! when some of your best medical authorities say it is a safeguard against yellow fever!"

Still Dan rejected the whisky. Meade was chagrined after many fruitless attempts.

In the course of a few days little Milly took yellow fever. Mrs. Fort was in the cabin with food and medicine daily until herself stricken. She had been in poor health for years. Her case had puzzled many doctors until she had left them. At times she would faint away and the pale, cold form would seem almost lifeless. Hours would pass away before Sarah could restore her. The faithful woman had served her thus as companion, nurse and doctor.

On the fifth day after her attack the yellow fever expert pronounced Mrs. Fort dead. Orders were given for her to be buried at once. Such was the alarm and confusion that none were present but the immediate family. Disease germs liberate rapidly from a corpse, increasing the danger, so that the dead are required to be buried immediately.

Sarah was indignant that her beloved "Miss Mary" should be buried without religious ceremony. Mrs. Fort lay there still and cold. For the first time in her life Sarah felt the weight of responsibility. If she could just ask Miss Mary what to do—but the overwhelming grief that she would have that dear counsellor no more, completely engulfed her. Then a sudden thought leapt through her brain. Suppose Mrs. Fort was not dead! Hadn't she often fainted and been cold and unconscious for hours! Oh, Heavens! If they were to bury her alive!

Her brain was maddened between sorrow and this apprehension. Dan came to her relief.

"We cannot bury mother to-day. The coffin has been sent. But, Sarah, my mother shall not be buried until you are satisfied that she is dead," declared Dan.

His grief was momentarily cast aside at the possibility of his mother being buried while in what might be a death-like swoon. But no one would believe it and the orders were positive. So they, Sarah and her husband, the servants, and Dan, the son, agreed they would have a sham burial. Jack and Dan buried the coffin.

But Sarah took the body into one of the back rooms. She opened up the room where Mrs. Fort had been ill to make it appear that she was there no more. They intended, if she were really dead, to bury her at night and no one need ever be any the wiser.

Dan did not know much more. He was the next victim of yellow fever. Sarah had double work, as she dared not call in the yellow fever doctor now. But with her old-fashioned warm blankets and herbal concoctions she brought Dan through. Imagine his joy when he regained consciousness, and Sarah whispered:

"Don't let Miss Mary know. She is much better, but very weak."

Mrs. Fort never knew for months afterwards what a narrow escape she had had from being buried alive.

Meade was also stricken by "yellow jack." His body had been so long bound by drink that all earthly help could not avail.

He died at two o'clock one night.

When the frost came in the autumn, Dan Fort left for college. When he said good-bye to Sarah he placed a paper in her hand.

It was a deed to the cottage and land where she lived—a gift from his mother, presented in "consideration of faithfulness and love."

Arthur Stewart.

A NEW SERIAL

ENTITLED

SANDY CARMICHAEL

Will begin in the Christmas Number of

. . Short Stories. . .

It is by C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE,

Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle" in PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Digitized by Google

It was after ten o'clock in the evening, but up in the fifth story of one of the modern office buildings, Prebbles still sat on his high stool, stooped over his books.

Prebbles was assistant book-keeper for the Jones and Marriott Company, Ltd. The Jones and Marriott Company was a corporation, and corporations, it is commonly supposed, are soulless. This could not have been the case with the Jones and Marriott concern, for it had ground the soul out of Prebbles; and if it had not absorbed that soul into its ledgers, day-books and journals, where then was it?

Prebbles had been so long beneath the upper and the nether millstones that he had become a part of the machine, and if he spoke of our foundry, our output, or our business, it was not because he felt a pride in them, particularly, but because he considered himself a part of the foundry, the output and the business.

Prebbles was tall and meagre. Thirty shillings a week is no temptation to high living, and after one reduces this stipend by paying fares and laundry bills, and purchasing a decent suit of clothes, spring and autumn, not a great amount is left for maintaining the body. But thirty shillings was all the Jones and Marriott Company could pay, so Prebbles toiled meekly on, and soothed his feelings with the reflections that our business would not totter and go to the wall simply because he demanded a "rise" and stuck to it.

Prebbles' face was painfully thin and pale; his eyes abnormally large and unusually dull for so bright a clerk, while his tawny hair was scanty and tinged with grey. Yet he was only thirty-five. Was it possible that ten years before, when he had entered the service of his employers, his face had been round and flushed with health, his blue eyes gleaming with hope and ambition, and his locks soft and abundant and without a silver line? It had become a tradition with Prebbles that this was so; but the health, the hope and ambition, and all the rest, had been absorbed in half-yearly dividends of five per cent. An acute mind was required to argue this question back from result to cause, and Prebbles' mind had long since ceased to be acute in dealing with anything outside of debits and credits.

With a patient sigh, Prebbles closed the ledger over which he had been poring, and picked up from the desk a hastily scrawled note, which read:

> The Jones and Marriot Company, Ltd.
>
> Gentlemen,—Four pounds a week was not enough for one holding the responsible position with you that I held. I could not live on it. If you had recognised merit, and had rendered me a just equivalent, I should not have been compelled to steal from you in order to eke out a livelihood. One thousand pounds, I think, will cover the amount I embezzled. Had it not been for Prebbles this would never have been discovered. Thanks to your stupidity, you did not believe him when he hinted that something was wrong. This delay affords me an opportunity to make off with the contents of the cash-box, which I do at once. You may follow, but you cannot find me.
>
> John Mortimer.

Prebbles had found this note tucked under the door when he had returned to the office after eating his late tea.

He had read it over at least a dozen times. His first impulse was to carry it straightway to Mr. Jones, but Mr. Jones had told him to work that night and seek to verify his first suspicions concerning Mortimer.

In Prebble's eyes, Jones was the personification of business acumen, and it might be wrong to allow the note to sway him from an assigned task.

If Prebbles reasoned wrongly, it was not his fault. Ten years of grind had rendered it impossible for him to reason very clearly on anything not appertaining to his particular line of work. So he had delved into the books, settled all doubts, and now, for the last time, he was reading Mortimer's note.

Nothing was now in the way of his taking the note to

Digitized by Google

Mr. Jones' house. Folding up the bit of paper, he placed it carefully in his waistcoat pocket, then he removed his cuff protectors and laid them in one corner of a certain drawer; after that, he washed his hands, brushed his tawny hair, put on his coat and hat, put the books in the safe, turned off the electric light and started for the door.

Prebbles, however, had a sudden thought as his hand touched the knob of the office door. Why not examine the cash-box and see if the money were gone from it? Possibly one of the first questions Mr. Jones would ask would be whether he had done this. If he could say he had, a word of commendation might be dropped for his benefit, and commendation, however slight, was dear to poor Prebbles' faithful heart.

Groping his way back, he turned on the light, opened the safe and the private drawer. It was not locked, and he lifted the cash-box. That was not locked either. He threw back the lid and looked within. Yes, the money was gone.

All that the box contained was some valuable papers inclosed in long envelopes.

From some unaccountable cause, this further proof of Mortimer's guilt launched Prebbles into a reminiscent mood. Prebbles rarely allowed himself to become reminiscent. It was always harrowing. Now, however, with Mortimer's ruin staring him in the face, he unconsciously climbed upon his stool and looked back over the past, while his thin, bony fingers crept absently among the papers in the cash-box.

Nine years before—nine ages it seemed to Prebbles—before hope had faded and ambition had quite taken wings, he had forgotten himself so far as to fall in love.

His soul was his own. He had loved humbly, but he had loved devotedly. How devotedly, sleepless nights, if they might speak, and falling tears, if the world might see them, would bear witness.

But Prebbles had a rival and the girl, who had not the tact to read a human heart as plain as Prebbles', chose the rival. She did it calmly and deliberately; and still, for Prebbles, night succeeded day, and winter followed summer as they had done in the past, when he had foolishly allowed himself to hope.

Time will soften grief, if it may not kill, and when one has a soul willing to sacrifice itself to the interests of others, treasured wrongs are apt to die with treasured memories, so that life becomes an entire blank.

Mortimer was Prebbles' old-time rival and, while Prebbles pitied Mortimer, his heart grew sick when he thought of Mortimer's deserted wife and children.

Strange how that thought touched a vital nerve in Prebbles' being! His ability to think, outside the well-worn groove, astonished him. How could he help Mortimer's wife?

With a pang he recalled that he was the indirect cause of Mortimer's disgrace. It was his work that had laid bare the embezzlement which, otherwise, might have remained undiscovered to the end of time. Ah! if he could help that deserted wife and her children! But thirty shillings a week——!

Prebbles put his elbow on the desk and rested his head on his hand. There was no unworthy thought in his heart; no wish that Mortimer might come to some bad end and his widow reconsider her unwise decision of nine years before. No! Something worldly had been aroused in Prebbles, but of such worldliness as seeking to profit by another's misfortune, he was as innocent as a babe.

Yet, if he were rich, if he could help Mortimer's wife anonymously——

He broke off his meditation with a shiver. He could scarcely believe his eyes. The hand that had been absently fumbling the papers in the cash-box was now clutching a packet of bank-notes. Prebbles rubbed his hand across his brow in a bewildered way and then examined the packet of notes.

One hundred pounds, just as it had come from the bank! Mortimer had not taken all the money in the cash-box, then.

This packet of notes was among the papers and had been overlooked. Prebbles was gratified. The company was one hundred pounds richer by Mortimer's oversight. This would prove a drop of comfort for Mr. Jones.

Delighted with the discovery, Prebbles dropped the notes into the box and closed the lid.

As he was about to replace the box in the safe, the devil entered his heart. He shut his eyes, and his hands suddenly began shaking as with a palsy. An instant later, he crouched over the box and glared about him.

Only the dark, shivering shadows were to be seen clinging to the corners of the room, crawling about the desks and chairs. He was alone! For the first time in ten long years his opportunity had come.

With a hoarse laugh that sounded like a wail from the depths of a tomb he threw open the lid of the box, clutched the notes and transferred them to his pocket.

"I have Mortimer's confession," muttered Prebbles, hoarsely; "he admits rifling the cash-box. He does not know that he overlooked this money, the company will not know! Mortimer took the contents of the cash-box and Mortimer has disappeared."

With sudden animation, he replaced the box in the safe, and closed the door.

There was a jaunty swing in his thin limbs as he started for the office door, his face was brighter, his eyes gleamed—ten years seemed to have fallen from his life. Opening the office door, he passed out, closing and locking it behind him. He rubbed his hands as he walked to the stairs to go away—away—where?

He was going into another world, into a world where every eye that looked at him would hold suspicion; into a world where he would shrink from the grasp of an honest hand; into a world whose confidence he had betrayed; into a world where life itself would be death and where death might be prayed for as a relief from his conscience, and prayed for in vain.

He halted; then he took a step forward and halted again.

Suddenly he turned and hurried back to the office at a run.

He tore open the office door like a madman; rushed in like a whirlwind; turned on the light after several bungling attempts and groaned again and again as in his excitement, he could not get the safe open.

But at last it was done. The money was returned to the cash-box and Prebbles, faint and trembling in every limb, leant his back against the closed door of the safe. He was almost overcome; his face was ashen and his lips pallid.

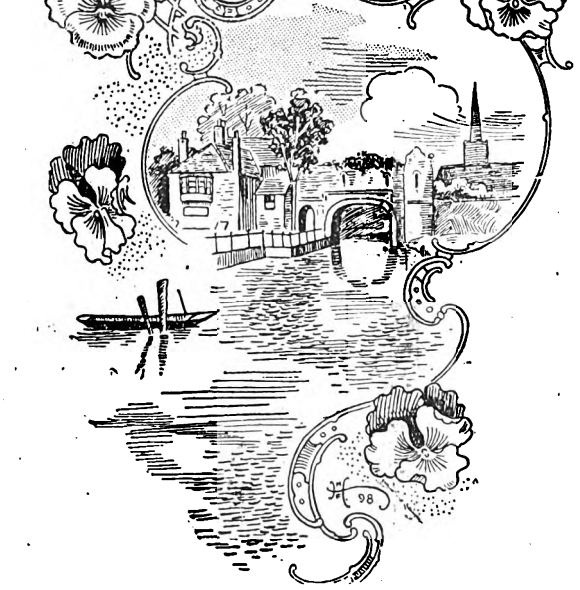
He took a step forward, tottered, fell. He strove to rise, but fell again, this time upon his knees. And as he knelt there, beside his old office stool, he clasped his hands and raised them aloft, with a quivering sob.

Just then a loud bell clanged the hour of midnight, and Time, the relentless, had ushered in a new day.

JOHN MACDONALD.

Digitized by Google

THE TWO CAPTAINS.



IMAGINE a diffident, silent, spare, but well-built and erect little white-haired, white-bearded man of, say, sixty—a man with those easily interested and trustful eyes you sometimes meet in a child's gaze (his were blue), imagine these qualities combined in a little elderly man, who had captained various vessels for nearly two score of years, and had never lost a ship; then you may form a picture, in your mind's eye, of Captain John Collings, of Liverpool.

Now imagine the captain's exact physical opposite. Then you may easily see Captain Lester—roughly, but firmly knit, lantern-jawed and cold-eyed. If Captain Lester had anything to say, he never hesitated to say it, and to say it in such words as allowed of no misunderstanding. He was as sure of himself as he was of the polar needle. Yet for years he had been sailing under Captain Collings as first mate, though he had previously sailed as captain and was entitled to the prefix.

The two were the closest of friends. I, as a boy, knew them both, for they were old friends of my father's while he was alive. He, too, was a seafaring man.

To me, as a boy, Captain Collings, small as he was, was an object of reverence and awe. Nobody could make such neat, fascinating, perfectly delightful things with tools; nobody had such wonderful deftness in the use of the jack-knife as Captain Collings had; and part and parcel of the sea though he was, he knew more about making and setting traps than anybody who spent his life ashore.

I liked the woods more than I did the sea. Many a time did the captain, while on shore, wander inland with me, and show me what he called his "idea of rigging a trap."

I shall never forget the dexterity, the neatness, and the sureness with which he made me the best "figure 4 trap" I have ever seen; and the delight of the day when he took me up to his own little private den where he slept, in his neat house, will remain with me as long as I live.

He was a widower, with one child, a girl about my own age, cared for and brought up, during his voyages at sea, by his unmarried sister, who kept house for him. But the charm of that room of his! On the neat shelves and quaint brackets of his own making arranged about the walls were models of boats of all conceivable rigs, complete to the smallest detail, and each so beautiful in its completeness that I looked and looked in speechless wonder.

Then he showed me, on the wall near the head of his bed, a miniature arrow; and while I was looking, it veered slightly, as it pointed midway between the S. and W. of the dial behind it.

"It's rigged on to the vane on the roof," he said. "It's a lot of foolishness," he added, with a chuckle, as I stood wrapt in admiration. Then my keen boy's eyes caught sight of a puzzling contrivance directly over a bracket lamp not far from the arrow.

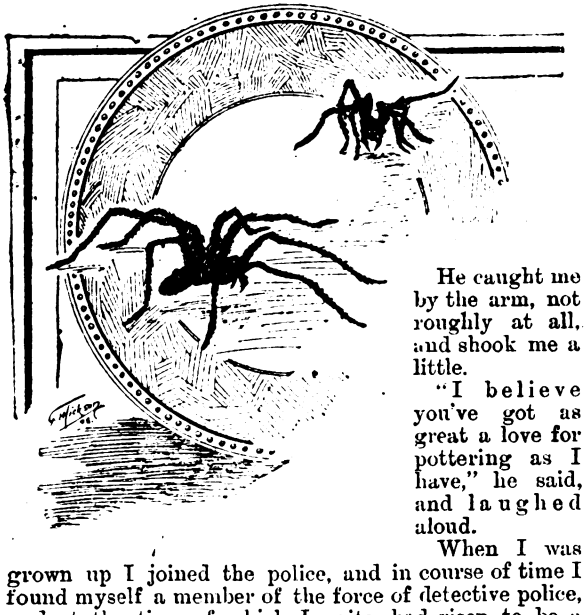
"What's that for, Captain?" I asked.

"Well, George," he answered, "sometimes I read in bed, and that there's a rig I've fixed so's to put out the lamp without tumbling out of my berth. They tell me it's bad to read in bed, but I dunno. Here, I'll show you."

He lighted the paraffin lamp, reached behind the head of his small wooden bedstead, and pulled a string that was, unseen by me, hanging there. It was all done quickly and quietly. As he pulled the string a small, fan-shaped piece of leather attached to the end of a slender wooden arm descended exactly, and with just the right amount of force, upon the open top of the lamp chimney, then sprang back into its former position. The flame of the lamp went out.

"Captain, that's grand!" I exclaimed.

Digitized by Google



He caught me by the arm, not roughly at all, and shook me a little.

"I believe you've got as great a love for pottering as I have," he said, and laughed aloud.

When I was grown up I joined the police, and in course of time I found myself a member of the force of detective police, and at the time of which I write, had risen to be a sergeant.

One day when, to kill time, I was reading every word of a morning newspaper, I came across, in the shipping news, a line or so stating that the three-master, Sarah, of Liverpool, Captain Collings, had earned quite a sum as salvage for towing a big Australian cargoship disabled by bad weather into port.

At this moment our messenger entered my room.

"There are two men outside who want to see you, sir."

"Who are they?" I asked.

"They didn't give their names; said you'd know them, sir."

"What do they look like?"

"Well, sir," the messenger answered, with the beginning of a smile in the corners of his mouth, "they look like the long and short of it, just ashore from a voyage."

"Show them in," I said, and was quite prepared to see, as I did, my father's old friends a minute later.

"How d'you do?" said Captain Collings shyly.

"Well, my son, how are you?" said Captain Lester in his inflexible, resonant voice. He had always addressed me as "my son," as he invariably did any younger man whom he liked. If he didn't like him, he used no form of address whatever; but simply looked him in the eye and spoke. He rarely called anybody by name.

We shook hands. As often happens in the case of a big man, Captain Lester gave no responsive grip whatever. His hand in mine felt like a big leather glove that had dried hard after a thorough wetting and had been stuffed with sand. Captain Collings, on the contrary, gave me a quick, warm, firm pressure of the hand. The upshot of it all was that they took supper with me that evening at a cosy restaurant I used to frequent: and, over a bottle or two, told me all about themselves and their plans.

"So, my son," said Captain Lester finally, slowly sipping his drink; "you see how it is. It's a matter of a thousand apiece for Collings and me—and what's more, we've got the money, the notes, all safe and tight," and here he let his big, hard hand fall upon my knee, and gripped and shook it gently. "Ain't that so, Collings?"

"Ee-us," said the latter for a reply, quietly, with a slow, acquiescing nod of the head.

"Well, what are you going to do now?" I asked.

"That's just it. You listen," said Captain Lester.

I listened.

"He's"—with a jerk of his big thumb towards Captain Collings—"goin' to write out to Susan in Ireland, and if everything's fit, he's going over there for a time to stay 'long of her and her husband and the children."

I must mention here that, much to Captain Collings' delight, his daughter Susan had, some years before, married a young Irishman.

Arthur Carey his name was, and the good little captain had always cherished a certain amount of pride because Susan was married to a "financial" man; for Carey was cashier of a bank.

"Children?" I asked. "I thought there was only one."

Captain Collings held up two fingers, and smiled and nodded. Something about him—I can't tell you what—conveyed the idea, too, that the children would have money in the bank some day.

"Yes, sir," continued Captain Lester, "he's going over to see 'em,"—with another jerk of his thumb towards his friend, accomplished this time by merely turning over his big hand, which now lay, gnarled and brown, before him on the table—"but afore that he wants to have his fling." Here Captain Lester turned and slowly winked at Collings, who smiled as he passed the back of his hand across his shaven upper lip. "Yes, sir, wants to spend two or three weeks here, looking round and eating at hotels. That it?" Captain Collings nodded. "Then go to Belfast; then back to port and take the Sarah agin." Captain Lester leant back in his chair and gazed at me sternly, as if I were a questionable sky.

"Who's going to sail the Sarah in the meantime?" I asked.

"I am," replied Captain Lester. "Seen the owner this morning; signed, all settled. Month or thereabouts, perhaps. Then he takes her agin, same's before. All understood, fair and above board."

"I see," I said.

"Now, my son," said Captain Lester, leaning forward his elbows on the table, "I want you to look after him. He wants a snug place to bunk—not meals—he's to get them at hotels. He wants a place where the money he has with him won't be in no danger whatsoever."

"The money?" I exclaimed in surprise.

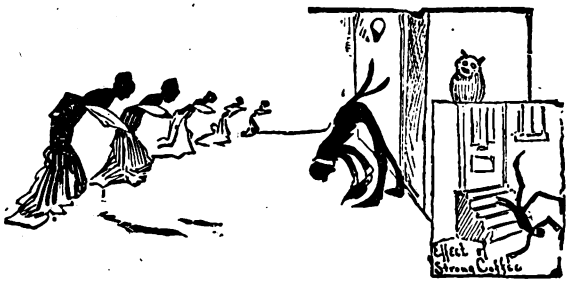
"Yes, my son, the money," Captain Lester repeated. "His'n mine. He's got both stowed away in his clothes."

Captain Lester leant back in his chair and stared at me hard, after having thrust his hands deep into his trousers pockets. He rocked slowly backwards and forwards on the hind legs of his chair.

"Why don't you deposit it in a bank?" I asked in amazement.

He shook his head. I argued. Captain Lester turned as smoothly from every argument I advanced as the rudder post of the Sarah turned in response to the pressure of his big hand upon the wheel; but he was, after all was said, as inflexible in his mental direction as the rudder post was in its mechanical limits.

Digitized by Google



"No, my son," he said at last, "I don't know no bank as well as I do him."

"But what do you intend to do with this money when you come back?" I asked.

"Build a coaster, won't we?" he said, glancing at his friend.

"Of course," said Captain John Collings, with more assurance than I had ever seen in him.

"Call her Susan, too," said Lester.

"If you say so," said Collings bashfully.

"Well, I do say so," replied Lester, as if he were ready and anxious to do battle for his choice.

Meanwhile, I have been thinking. A friend of mine, Jack Fitzgerald, solicitor's clerk, had a room in one of the houses that used to be the mansions of the merchants years ago. Low studded and wainscotted (simply wainscotted with broad, smooth, painted panels), but sunny, and in a quiet, decent neighbourhood. It was a lovely old house and a loveable old room. Jack was away—was in the South of England for two months on business.

That night the captains slept aboard the Sarah, but the next day I received a telegram from Jack, in reply to my letter sent the night before.

Jack's answer was like himself—short, sharp, and satisfactory. All it said was:

"Of course. Jack."

In due time I "stowed away," to use his own expression, Captain Collings, together with his tin cash box, in Jack's room; and Captain Lester sailed away in command of the Sarah.

Then I let the little captain alone for a few days—to have his fling.

At length I called upon him to see how he was getting on, and how he stood "eating at hotels." I found him in, but—mercy! what a change! Instead of my clear-eyed, childlike, gentle friend, I found a pale, haggard, bent, and what was far worse, mumbling old man. I threw my arm about him, and begged him to tell me what was the trouble. For a moment he seemed like himself. He patted me on the shoulder, shook me by the hand, laughed—or tried to—and said he was "just as well as ever he was." But the next moment he became again the wreck I found him.

With the utmost gentleness, I tried to question him, but all to no purpose. He always came back to the same reply: "Just as well as ever I was, George; don't you worry." The pitiful attempt at a laugh that always followed my expressions of anxiety brought my heart into my mouth; and the look in his eyes, part terror, part despair, pierced it like a knife.

Instinctively I glanced about the room. It was the same as when Jack left it, except that here and there, in places where it could be done without disturbing Jack's belongings, the Captain had put things of his own—sea things, curiosities, queer relics of voyages. For instance, on the low, narrow mantelpiece that ran along above the old-fashioned, broad, open fireplace, I noticed, in spaces hitherto unused, a bronze Japanese figure, an East Indian idol in miniature, and so on, in various spots about the room, though not in many.

I noticed, too, his tin cash box under the head of his bed. It occurred to me that here might lie the trouble; but, no—he assured me, with the first semblance of real alertness he had shown, that it was safe and sound. Indeed, he now became, for him, positive and insistent, even more so than was necessary, that the cash box and its contents were all right. Finally, I gave it up, decided to come over the next day, and took my leave.

The next day I called. He was out. I called again and again. He was always out, and the door of his room was always locked. Then I questioned the landlady, whom I knew to be a reliable woman. But really, he was such a quiet little man, and gave so little trouble, she hadn't noticed; except that once he had asked her if there were a hardware shop near, and that when he came back, after having gone out for an hour or so, he was carrying a bundle.

At last I found him in once more. It was several days later, and again I was surprised at the change in his appearance. He was not my Captain Collings, to be sure; but he was nearer to it. He seemed more alive, less dejected, and, what I, by force of habit, I suppose, especially noted, less haunted by fear. But there was an eagerness, an alertness, a restlessness about him I did not like.

This time I took a new tack. I asked him what he had heard from his daughter. To this he replied, with even added eagerness, that she was "first rate." I asked him when he expected to go to her. He looked anywhere but at me—so unlike him—and went back to the mumbling. At length the mumbling resolved itself into coherence, and I distinguished words.

"Long journey; thought I'd wait till Lester reached port. Stay ashore a little longer, p'r'aps." All of which ended in a laugh, intended to convey the impression of nonchalance, and failing utterly to do so.

But now his manner changed with marked suddenness; he became almost keen.

"You're a detective?" he asked.

"Of course," I replied, for I knew he knew it.

"Well, you read that," he said, and thrust a letter at me. It was written with pen and ink, on ordinary stationery, such as you might buy at a general shop. I read these words:

"Captain.—We know you have the money—yours and his. Meet us in Portland Street at nine p.m. on the fifteenth, and give it up, or you will be a dead man next day."

There was no signature. At last I knew. My poor old friend was being slowly but surely frightened to death. I laughed aloud in my joy, for I knew that if any man could comfort and protect him, I could. I soothed and reassured him.

I asked for the envelope, but unfortunately he had destroyed it. We sat late into the night discussing a plan of my suggestion.

The fifteenth was two days off, and Captain Collings finally agreed, in response to my request, to walk the length of Portland Street at ten p.m. on that night. Of course, I meant to have my men carefully stationed.

Throughout our talk he was much more like himself, and, with a weight off my mind, I left him. I was sure of my ground now.

I called again the next day to again reassure him.

Digitized by Google

He had received another letter, written like the first, and on the same kind of paper. It said only this:

"Remember. If you don't, you're a dead man on the sixteenth."

Again there was no signature, but this time he had preserved the envelope, so I knew where the letter had been posted. But the time was too short to do anything, so this information, was, to a degree, immaterial.

Once more I sat with Captain Collings and talked over the plan. Everything was arranged, and he agreed to every arrangement. He was like, yet strangely unlike, himself.

"I see by this morning's paper," he said abruptly, "that the Sarah is near home. Lester'll be here on the sixteenth."

I was glad of that, and told him so. When I left him, he was almost like himself in every way.

The night of the fifteenth was warm and clear, with a full moon shining. "Hard on our friends, the murderers," I thought to myself, as the Captain and I walked to his rendezvous. We carried out our programme to the letter. Captain Collings walked Portland Street from end to end, apparently alone, but always guarded, and not a soul did he meet.

Evidently our quarry had smelt a rat and had taken flight. As I walked back to the room with the Captain, we talked the matter over, and decided to await developments. He agreed that it would be best to stay in his room the next day, the sixteenth, and I assured him the house would be carefully guarded.

As I left him at the door, I laughed off the whole affair. When I bade him "good night," he held out his hand and said, in the same old quiet, bashful way I had always (until recently) known:

"Well, good-night, George. I know you'll take care o' me, you and Lester. Somehow I feel as if it might happen, though, to-morrow."

I again reassured him, and, after seeing him safely indoors, went home. He didn't know it, but two of my men were at that moment on the watch, and remained so all that night.

The next morning I was on the ground again. Nothing whatever had happened, my men told me. As I was walking with them I felt a weight on my shoulder. I turned and found the explanation.

The weight was Captain Lester's hand, and I heard his level voice saying, "Well, my son, how are you?" He had arrived at Tilbury early that morning, and had come direct to his old friend.

We entered the house together, and went to Captain Collings' door. I knocked. No answer.

"Ah! that hotel-eating makes him sleepy," said Captain Lester. "Give me a turn," and he knocked three times with his great, brine-hardened knuckles. It was enough to wake the dead, and, Heaven help us! that's what was needed.

Then we found that the door was not locked. We went in. The bright, warm sunlight was streaming into the room, and little Captain Collings was sitting peacefully in the armchair near the corner of the fireplace. I saw at a glance the small, round, dark blue spot in the centre of his forehead.

Captain Lester reached the chair first. Then I heard what I pray I may never hear again—the sounds of a great, big, simple heart in abject grief. He knelt by his friend, and fondled the hand resting on the arm of the chair. The other was hanging limp.

"Jack! Son! 'Tain't true! Say it ain't true!" and he bowed his head and sobbed aloud.

I waited. Then I touched him on the shoulder.

"Captain," I said, "this is murder!"

He was on his feet in an instant.

"Murder!" he whispered, looking at me. "Murder!" His voice was now like low, distant thunder. He turned, and for the first time saw the bullet hole in Captain Collings' forehead. "By Heaven! Who done it?"

These words came from him as if they were the last gasp from some overtaxed, exhausted, mighty engine. He looked a giant as he stood there, his arms at his side, but each bent inward, and his great fists clenched.

"Who done it, I say?" he repeated, but this time with a snarl like a tortured lion's.

"That we must find out," I said as gently as I could. "We must be calm, first of all, and see what we can find."

"Right, my son," he groaned. "I'm calm now," and he was; but his face! It was scarred by awful grief already.

"The cash box! See!" I exclaimed. We hurried to the bed together. Near it lay the box, open and empty, save for one single paper, a letter. I started to take it from the box, but Lester was quicker than I. In an instant he had it, and read the address. I had read it, too. It was addressed to him.

He turned to me, and said three words:

"You sit down."

I sat down. Standing where he was, he opened the letter and read. There was an inclosure. He read that, too. As he read, he breathed hard through his teeth, and sobbed.

While he was reading I had time to collect my thoughts, and started to my feet to call my men from the window Again came the three words, and—I sat down.

At last he raised his gaunt head from the papers. He walked to the armchair, and passed round it to the side next the fireplace looking at the floor. He stooped and pointed at what I had not, in my distress, noticed before.

Beneath the limp arm that hung down lay a piece of white twine on the floor, in many S's, L's, and O's, as if it had been jerked there. Then he stared at me, a long, agonised, hopeless stare. At last he spoke, and all he said was:

"You keep sitting down."

He looked closely at the old-fashioned carving that formed the outer edge of the mantelpiece itself. Next he looked at his dead friend, and sighed.

Then he went to the further side of the fireplace, and felt carefully along the moulding bordering a large panel that evidently to me, knowing as I did these old houses, covered some unused space beside the chimney breast.

His examination was short. He gave me a look as he finished, and his look plainly repeated his last four words. He went quickly to the cupboard near the bed, returning immediately carrying a few simple tools. I saw they were new. Quickly and neatly his bulky hands did his bidding; mouldings, boards, finally the panel itself came off, and all almost without a sound. He was between me and what he was doing. He spoke over his shoulder.

"Lock that door."

I did it.

"Look here."

I came to his side and looked in the opening.

"See?" he said.

His voice was deep and quiet. I saw it all at a glance.

Digitized by Google

In the pattern of the carving were recurrent, deep circular depressions; one of these had been bored through, forming a hole which led into the space behind the panel piece. Pointing through this hole, with fatal accuracy, was a revolver, lashed in place with infinite neatness. For the rest, I saw nothing but a heavy iron weight, a few slender notched sticks, a trap, and a piece of string—all lying together on the floor at the bottom of the space behind the panel. This was all I saw, but I knew.

"Sit down," said Captain Lester.

As I did so he drew towards him a chair and sat down himself, exactly facing me.

"Now you listen."

He took from his pocket, where he had carefully placed them, the papers we found in the box.

"This is from him," he said, "to me. But I'll read it to you."

Then he read as follows:—

LESTER,

I ain't been murdered. I done it myself I've stole your money, and don't dare to face you. Before reading further please read the letter from Susan, inclosed.

Here he opened and read the inclosure:

DEAR FATHER,

We are in fearful trouble, and I write to you for help. Don't blame Arthur. He has always been a good husband to me, and I love him dearly. He has taken money from the bank to speculate with, and oh, father, I know it will kill you with grief! we've got to have £2,000 at once, or Arthur will have to go to prison. Think of me and the children, father dear, and help us if you can.

SUSAN.

Without comment, Captain Lester returned to the letter from his friend:

Now, Lester, you know why I done it. My last wish is that she should always think I have been murdered. If she should find out I had done just what her husband did, it would break her heart. She's all right now. I sent her your money and mine. If you can find it in your heart to do what I ask you will much oblige

JOHN COLLINGS.

When Captain Lester had finished reading, he carefully refolded the papers and put them back in his pocket. Then he turned to me.

"You stand up," he said, as he arose himself. I stood. He placed a hand on each of my shoulders. I felt his grip then. I can feel it still.

"My son," he said, looking down into my eyes, "there's just two men who knows about this. Just as soon as any more knows it, one o' them two has got to die, if I have to kill him. What do you say?"

For answer I held out my hand. Wouldn't you have? He threw his arms about me, and we cried like children.

Then we quietly destroyed all evidence of suicide, and replaced the panel and moulding. This finished, I glanced hurriedly through the writing desk. I didn't find much, merely a piece of blotting paper, upon which some letters, reversed, were visible. I could easily read. In a drawer, I found, also, a few sheets of paper like that used in the threatening letters. Then I went out and gave my men instructions in regard to Captain John Collings' murder.

* * * * *

Captain Lester went down with the Sarah, in the great gale of '93. Both Susan and her husband are dead. Otherwise I should not have told this tale.

M. HIGGINS.

LANDLADY: "Well, I must do something to keep the wolf from the door."

Boarder: "I don't know that it is altogether necessary. Let him come in and partake of one of your breakfasts, and I don't think he'll trouble you again."

AL WRIGHT: "My wife and I used to quarrel nearly all the time, but now we have the most peaceful home you ever saw."

Henry Peck: "Indeed! How did you manage it?"

Al Wright: "I simply make my wife so cross she refused to speak to me."

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 7.

FOUR of the people whose names were selected to receive a sovereign each on application have applied for their money. They are:

WILLIAM ARMSTRONG, Croft Cottage, Ross-on-Wye.

CORPORAL THOS. GOLDING, H Company, 2nd Devon Regt., Aldershot.

F. ASHLEE, 47 Gillett Road, Thornton Heath.

H. B. APPLEYARD, 72 Winkingham Road, Grimsby.

Below are the names of those who failed to apply for the money awaiting them:

R. S. Muir, 43 Arlingford Road, Brixton, S.W.; Thos. Wood, 27 Moss Lane, Swinton, Manchester; W. Chas. Griffiths, 85 Elliott Street, Tyldesley; J. Murphy, 36, Clorliffe Road, Dublin; G. H. Perceval, 17 Warminster Road, South Norwood; P. Geraght, 13 Hauteville, Guernsey; W. E. James, "Rosedale," Leighton-on-Sea, Essex; J. R. Smyth, 19 Garlic Hill, E.C.; G. Cooper, 75 Maryville Street, Donegall Pass, Belfast; F. M. Whittingham, 5 Alvington Terrace, Cattedown Road, Plymouth; J. B. Pinker, Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.; Miss V. E. Carter, The High School, Lichfield; Miss H. Stille, 25 Snowdon Road, Eccles, Manchester; P. G. How, 38 West Street, Leytonstone; J. H. Kendle, 55 High Street, Bognor; Jos. Bell, 83 Albert Edward Road, Liverpool; S. B. Perrett, Market, Bristol; Staff-Sergt. Alfred Jenkins, Army Pay Corps, The Barracks, Cardiff; W. Wilson, 72 Millgate, Selby; C. Leitherbarrows, Warkworth, Northants; A. Fuller, High Street, Ramsey, Hunts; John Kirk, 28 Burton Road, Brixton, S.W.; Mrs. Mure, 35 Underwood Road, Paisley; R. Maclean Scott, 124 W. Graham Street, Glasgow; J. Ure, 18 Kellie Place, Alloa, N.B.; Mrs. Adey, 14 Sotheby Road, Highbury, N.; David Davies, J.P., 22 Canon Street, Aberdare; J. J. Taylor, Angel Hotel, Godalming; W. Rowlands, 1 Rock Villas, Mountain Ash; W. Evans, Church Road, Caerphilly; H. Mells, Oakleigh, West Liss, Hants; Mrs. Palmer, New Road, Solihull, Birmingham; P. P. Down, St. Vincent, Torrs Park, Ilfracombe; G. Webb, Castle Hall, Winchester; Mrs. Nichols, Trevellick, Cornwall; W. Footitt, 2 Claremont Villas, Gloucester Road, Ross; Mrs. Beech, Stafford Road, Oakengates; Levi Massey, Church Street, Church Gresley; E. Brown, 36 Potter Street, Worksop; J. B. Johnson, 30 Hollybank Road, Birkenhead; W. Abbot, Church Street, Lutterworth, Leicestershire; J. A. Bagshaw, High Street, Uppingham, Rutland; John Foster, 47 Cardigan Street, Oxford; Mrs. Dell, Bell Street, Princes Risborough; John Sears, 11 Park Street, Windsor; H. White, Linden House, Dunstable.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The Blow at Southern France.

A few weeks only had elapsed since the enemies of England had burst upon her in all their fury of fierce and sudden attack, and yet never was her command of the sea, her overwhelming supremacy above and beyond all other nations, more unquestionable or complete.

Her armies, it is true, were still in three foreign countries, struggling inch by inch against amazing odds, and by sheer courage and audacity forcing themselves towards the capitals of three great kingdoms. But upon the ocean highway there was but one flag, the Union Jack. The British Navy had asserted itself once more, and vindicated the boast which jealous rivals deem so arrogant. It swept the seas with unchallenged dominion.

"It was at the Nile and not at Waterloo that Europe found salvation," Admiral Mahan had once declared. "England may smite her enemies with her armies; she crushes them with her fleet."

The gallant sailor may have given a flourish of enthusiasm to his opinion from his deep love of blue water, and of those who navigate it. But there was profound truth in his remark. When the British navy threw an impenetrable wall, as it were, around the dominions of the three allied kingdoms, chased and caught their ships, closed their ports, barred their supplies, threatened their towns, and menaced their coasts, their fortunes were already tottering. And this had been done swiftly, completely, and with marvellous ease.

During the first stage of the war the Mediterranean was reduced to the condition of a lake. The French and German vessels could get neither out nor in. They were imprisoned in an inactivity which was the more ludicrous because there was no British possession to spoil. A few shells had been hurled upon Malta, which smiled cheerfully at the foe, secure in her impregnability. It was mere waste of time and shot to pound away at this inaccessible sea-girt rock.

A sanguine French captain suggested Cyprus.

The Admiral glared at him:

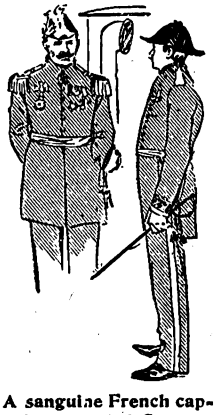
"And what will you capture there? Only a few figs and a bundle of the Sultan's unpaid bills!"

"But," stammered the luckless officer, "it will be something wrested from the British Empire."

"Yes," retorted the Admiral angrily, "you might as well think of robbing a man of his wart."

So Cyprus was left unscathed; partly, it must be confessed, because the German Admiral avowed he had not made his will, and whilst quite ready to take the risks of a mere naval engagement, he did not think he was called upon to encounter the climatic danger of a landing upon Cyprus at that time of year.

The position was indeed a helpless one. For a whole month these great vessels had steamed about in a weak and aimless fashion, which evoked the bitter irony of the Petit Journal. That popular little paper demanded that the Government should order the German and French fleets to act as excursion steamers between Marseilles and Naples, at popular rates, as some contribution toward the expenses of the war. And the Hamburg Zeitung was roused from its ponderous solemnity to defy a prosecution for lèse-majesté, and print the following stanza after Goethe:



A sanguine French captain suggested Cyprus.

Know'st thou the seas where our battleships fare?
Where the water is blue, and the heavens are bright;
Where there's nothing to battle, and no one to fight—
They are there, my child, they are there!

But the English fleet had no intention of giving the excellent commanders of the hostile battleships a holiday.

As reinforcements came after the victory in the Atlantic, and from Havre, several swift and decisive movements were made from Gibraltar which followed in one division after another being caught, and captured or sunk. It was not a difficult task, for by this time the combined fleets were far outnumbered, and fell an easy prey.

It thus happened that in a short space of time the Mediterranean was once more ridden by the invincible navy of England. And it followed from this that the Indian mails were scarcely interfered with, and went to and fro with the usual regularity and dispatch. The only difference was that they were carried from Suez to Port Said by train, the ocean stages being performed by gunboats.

Digitized by Google

But this serenity was not confined to the Mediterranean. The destruction of the Russian fleet swept the last enemy's ship from the open. The navies of France and Germany were sunk or shattered. Never before was the sea so safe, commerce less suspended, or order so prevalent.

Whilst the three most powerful countries of the Continent were in the throes of a grim death struggle, the frail brigantine of some small shipowner might sail boldly forth through foreign waters, bearing her burthen of grain or coal without a moment's perturbation. The trade of England continued brisk as ever. Her manufactures passed quickly to a thousand markets, rendered clamorous by the failure of French and German exporters, and prepared to pay high prices. For similar reasons there flowed into her ports an uninterrupted stream of corn and meat, and all the other necessaries of life, at rates which were incredibly small.

It was this that led to a remark of M. Zola's which brought him much ill-will—a fact he cared the less for because he had by this time been grudgingly elected a member of the French Academy.

"The greatness of England," he said in a pamphlet, "is that she can go quietly on with her business undisturbed, whilst her neighbours are quivering beneath the shock of cannon. She is a huge commercial house whose principal says on a Monday morning to one of his clerks: 'I want you to fight someone over the way. Go and pummel his head and then come back. But I can't have fisticuffs in this office and shall expect you on your stool to-morrow at ten.' And whilst his clerk puts on his coat and steps across to do what he is told, his master quietly turns over his ledger and looks the next order. The result is, his clerk is there next morning, with only one black eye. Depend upon it, when the cataclysm comes and the waters overwhelm the earth once more, England will be found floating on top, serene and unruffled, and gazing with undisguised greed on the rapid growth of her oceanic empire!"

M. Zola's windows were broken, but he only smiled. The pamphlet was in its tenth edition.

The remaining countries of Europe had been staggered at the distinctive character of the events that were taking place. Their position was an anxious one. But each, from policy or pusillanimity, soon found excellent reasons for becoming neutral.

Austria did not love Germany. It was a quarrel of brothers—a quarrel the more bitter because the one had done the other an irreparable injury. When the Emperor William asked co-operation from Vienna, or at least a friendly attitude, a dexterous answer was given. "Austria," wrote the Chancellor. "did not desire to impede the plans of Germany by premature action."

But her mind was fully made up. Either Germany and her allies would destroy England or it would in turn be destroyed. In either case Austria gained by waiting. If the allies fared ill she would have an immediate advantage in any share of the spoil that might follow. She had even tender hopes of regaining her lost provinces. But if Germany were victorious, and were inclined to show arrogance in settling up the question of the British possessions, Austria obviously had a far better chance of claiming her fair share if, with her powerful army, she might menace a weakened and palsied neighbour. For it was clear that the victors in the war would only be less crippled than the vanquished, and so Austria took care to offend neither combatant by overt act.

Italy, with chivalry of a brave if not over-vigorous friend, hastened to offer England the assistance of her diminished navy. But Great Britain delicately refused. She felt that Italy could not stand the burden of so costly an alliance. Already on the verge of bankruptcy, this new responsibility would prove her ruin. The kindliest messages were interchanged, and the Italian government were gratified by the high expressions of goodwill used in the despatches from Whitehall.

"Our navy is, we deem, sufficient for the task before it—enormous though it be," wrote Lord Salisbury, "we will, therefore, only avail ourselves of your generous proposal if necessity compels. In any case, you may rest assured that we feel the liveliest sense of gratitude, a feeling we trust that Providence will enable us to demonstrate practically if the infamous struggle which we are maintaining turns in our favour."

The policy of Spain was delightful. She had been asleep for two centuries, a sleep scarcely disturbed by the shock of the Cuban war. But she was nothing if not grandiose, and to her ministers it appeared that her attitude was one of profound anxiety and supreme importance to both belligerents.

There were in her dockyards at the time six battleships. The history of these was painful in the extreme. It had taken twenty years to conceive them. When the order was reluctantly given, they rose slowly and with difficulty from theory into fact. Changes of ministry had delayed them. The death of naval constructors altered them. Sudden fits of economy had pruned them. Financial crisis had left them lingering half-way towards their birth, sighing in vain on their mouldering staithes for safe delivery to post-humous completion.

And when the consummation was reached it unhappily turned out that so many years had elapsed during the course of construction that they were lamentably out of date, and so patched and altered and old-fashioned that, as one British tar asserted valiantly, a plucky tug might almost have taken them in turn and "stove 'em in!"

It was these deadly engines of war that Spain, at the first opening of hostilities, had offered as a free gift to France. The rest of her fleet—which, it might be mentioned, was mainly built in Lord Armstrong's yards—she declared she would keep for purposes of defence. The offer was made with such high-flown eloquence that M. Hanotaux swore the phrases might have been copied from Don Quixote.

But the reverses of France and Germany followed quickly, and Spain trembled at the thought that she had perhaps been guilty of an indiscretion. Her ministers assembled in council and deliberated.

The result was that one fine morning the loungers around the Barcelona dockyards were surprised to find painters busy at the prow of the largest battleship. The name she bore was the Spain and France. With dexterous brush the latter part of this title was expunged and in a brief space of time the vessel nobly rode upon her bed of wood under the name of the Spain and England.

Painters busy at the prow of the largest battleship.

Accustomed to sudden changes of this sort, the Barcelona loungers only whistled a few bars from the Barber of Seville, and went their way.

Turkey shivered within her boundaries. Whatever the result of the war might be, it was clear that the Ottoman Empire was doomed. There could no longer be a "balance of power" to uphold. The victors would remain supreme, and one of their first acts would be to split up the historic kingdom and drive from Europe the last element of barbarism that disgraced her.

It was a pitiful position for any country to occupy. Turkey had thriven by the mutual jealousies of her neighbours. Her security lay in the permanence of their hatred of each other. But even to the Ottoman mind it was patent that there could be only a single issue to this gigantic conflict. No longer would equality exist amongst the great powers. One of these must attain an overwhelming ascendency, and that one, whether Russia, Germany, or England, would insist on carrying out Mr. Gladstone's bag and baggage policy.

Digitized by Google

"What idiots we are to quarrel with such people."

Turkey now formed the wisest conclusion she had come to for generations. She decided that if the end had to come, it was better for her that her fate should be determined by Great Britain. She was assured she would obtain more justice and consideration from her one avowed enemy than from any of her pretended friends. And she thus decided on an act of policy which proved of the greatest value to England. She closed the Bosphorus to the fleets of Russia and blocked up the Black Sea.

This unexpected danger was not the only one that Russia had to encounter. There lay at her gates three small, new-created, struggling, but brave States who had suffered much from her overbearing interference, and yet, with splendid heroism, had kept at bay the encroaching power of the insolent Slav. These were Servia, Bulgaria, and Roumania.

No sooner had Russia thrown in her power with the enemies of England, and distracted by the perils that beset her on either hand, lay an easier prey to her tiny neighbours, than the three States formed a hasty alliance, and resolved once and for all to throw off the galling yoke they had borne so long. It was a gallant and a dangerous enterprise, for Russia was as yet untouched, and it was not clear that she might not emerge from the contest victorious. But, knit to England by many ties of gratitude, and spurred by national spirit and patriotic ardour, they defied the event, mobilised their forces, and inaugurated a troublesome and untiring guerilla warfare against the southern provinces of Russia. Their action was destined to bear splendid fruit. It formed part of the chain of destiny that was to throttle the strength of Slavonic despotism.

Such was the condition of the countries of Europe when Sir Redvers Buller, in the middle of June, landed near Marseilles his Mediterranean Army Corps. It consisted of 200,000 men, of whom 120,000 were colonists. This new bolt was launched at France when she was already staggering from the effects of her terrible disasters on the banks of the Seine.

Sir Redvers Buller practically repeated the tactics adopted by Lord Roberts in effecting the capture of Havre. Six hours after the landing was effected a large number of the British contingent was encamped on La Cannebière, the famous boulevard of which the Provençals say:

"Si Paris avait La Cannebière, Paris serait un petite Marseille!"

Even the Colonial and Australian troops, fresh as they were to the actualities of warfare, were impressed by the half-heartedness of the resistance offered by their opponents. What was even more noticeable was the attitude of the people.

No man in France is more thoroughly patriotic than the Southerner, if his national pride be aroused and his sense of duty stirred.

But in the large towns of France, Paris excepted, there was a growing feeling of dismay at the progress of the war, and this was engrafted upon the earlier expression of public amazement when the wholly unexpected campaign burst upon them. Marseilles was a busy port, and had consequently suffered much as the direct outcome of the irrational undertaking of the Parisian politicians.

Hence the army of occupation found a remarkable readiness on the part of the shopkeepers to once more handle the British sovereign, that passe-partout which speaks all tongues with equal facility.

The Colonial troops astounded the Marseillais with their seeming prodigality, for the contrast between their habits and those of the penurious French soldier was striking indeed.

"What idiots we are to quarrel with such people," remarked a hotel proprietor to his confidant, the notary. "It is miraculous, but a common soldier, look you, orders a dinner that one of our generals would be glad to eat; and he pays for it, too!"

General Buller himself did not fail to note the passivity of the non-combatants. He commented strongly on the fact in his dispatches, and drew from it the conclusion that when negotiations for peace became practicable, there would be a large body of public opinion in favour of a rapid settlement.

This was the first rift in the dark cloud of murderous menace that threatened England. It was made much of in the Press at home, and its significance did not escape the authorities in Paris.

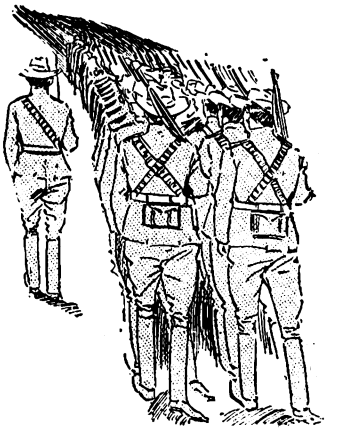
Hence there came imperative orders to the general commanding at Lyons to force an immediate engagement, whilst the Chalons Army Corps was hurried southwards to complete the discomfiture of the invaders.

Lord Wolseley's judgment was thus fully borne out by the progress of events.

In the neighbourhood of Miramas took place the first pitched battle between Buller's force and the Lyons troops. In his haste to obey orders the French commander blundered on to the British position at the close of a long day's march. The fight commenced almost in the dark, and the English general felt intuitively that accident and not design was the genesis of the attack.

He resolved, therefore, not to delay matters. Leaving the centre to continue a desultory struggle, he hurled two well constituted columns at the French left and right simultaneously, with instructions to follow parallel roads until they converged at a point some seven miles from Arles.

These human wedges split up the French into fragments. The Canadians especially proved to be experts in night marching, and the enemy speedily became convinced that owing to the incapacity of their leaders they were offered up as a holocaust.



The Canadians especially proved to be experts in night marching.

Even the brave troops of France grew tired of being butchered to make a political holiday. They melted into the gloom as effectually as possible, and when morning dawned the mournful tokens of war alone showed that resistance had been offered to the British advance. The Lyons army corps was non-existent, and the General sent his wife a message that she had better take the youngsters to the Swiss lakes

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XL.

Russia's Rude Awakening.

Captain Applin amused himself at the submarine telegraph office in Uzun Ada for some days before the Grand Duke Paul, generalissimo of the Czar's Caucasian army, became aware that things had gone wrong, somehow.

"Has this demand been complied with?"

Many strange messages had been sent to Baku across the Caspian.

For instance, an imperative request came, purporting to be from the Chief Transport Officer on the Asian side, that a steam launch should be forthwith loaded with cigars and wine, and, if possible, some Scotch whiskey, and dispatched at once.

This order was actually carried out before his highness the Grand Duke received a telegram from Moscow which blanched his swarthy cheeks and caused him to use forms of the Russian language which are not to be found in grammars or "Conversation Manuals for Travellers."

He furiously summoned the chief members of his staff, and when they had assembled he read to them the message which had so perturbed him.

It ran:

"Officer commanding at Orenburg reports that the whole of the Transcaspian Railway between Uzun Ada and the Oxus, with accumulated stores for use of Alikhanoff and for your expedition, has been seized by English force. Intelligence so astounding that it was wholly disbelieved, until the same officer, confirmed by Colonel and Major of the 7th Siberian Regiment, stationed at Orenburg, emphatically reiterated it. How is it that this terrible catastrophe seems to be unknown to you? And what has become of Alikhanoff?"

The telegram was dated June 24th, and was signed by the Chief of the Imperial Staff in the name of the Tsar Nicholas II.

"Surely, sir," cried a grizzled veteran of the Russo-Turkish campaign, "there is some ghastly hoax about this business?"

"Ghastly indeed," growled the Grand Duke, "but I fear it is we who have been hoaxed. Bring me the file of recent cablegrams from Uzun Ada," he roared to an aide-de-camp, who soon reappeared with the carefully preserved sheets of tissue.

The uppermost one had reference to the Scotch whiskey.

"A strange request," was the Duke Paul's comment.

The next peremptorily forbade the proposed dispatch from Baku of two Crimean regiments. "The hungry crew would eat us up in a few hours," was Applin's facetious comment, made in the name of the Russian Commandant General Konsky.

"Curious language for Konsky to address to you, sir,' observed a staff officer.

"I thought so at the time," murmured the Grand Duke, as though speaking to himself. "Now I understand it more fully."

The third message suggested that it would be convenient if a vessel were loaded up with four million rounds of cartridges for the Berdan rifle, together with any guns and cases of shells that might be awaiting transport. "We shall find them extremely useful at an early date," explained Applin, vice Gronovitch, head of the Ordnance Department for Transcaspia.

"Has this demand been complied with?" said the Russian chief, turning with icy calmness to the officer whose duty it was to attend to such matters.

"I regret to say, your Highness, that the vessel left yesterday. We forwarded six batteries with 800 rounds per gun. I am sorry. I could not know——"

"Enough. I alone am to blame. Fool that I am not to have realised there was something wrong. When did the last steamer leave Uzun Ada that arrived here?"

The man addressed consulted some memoranda before he answered:

"On June 12th."

"Then, gentlemen, it is very clear that shortly after that date the English by some means occupied Transcaspia, and it follows as an inevitable corollary that Alikhanoff has been defeated, nay, annihilated, else news of the disaster must have reached us from Penjdeh or Khushk."

If Applin had heard this conversation he would have cabled the remark that Russia must now see the grave error she committed in being habitually twelve days behind the time.

But he had other diversions at that particular moment.

The departure of the steamship and the launch having been duly reported to him, he prepared for their arrival three days later. This was a simple matter. When a vessel arrived at Uzun Ada from any destination, she was at once boarded by a number of officials, apparently Russians by their uniform, but really consisting of Applin himself and Shah Nawas Khan, with a squad of Turkomans, who vastly enjoyed the masquerading.

The Captain and crew were promptly seized and the vessel safely tied up in the harbour, with a strong guard on board.

The total cessation of cablegrams from Baku now however, warned Colonel Peyton of the near approach of a crisis.

He had to depend entirely upon his native levies, strengthened by a couple of squadrons of dragoons from Colonel Doyne's brigade. Guns in plenty were available, and, by dint of constant effort, he had managed to make some of the Turkomans efficient gunners. They were desperately afraid of the weapons, but the presence of a British trooper with each gun detachment made things work more easily.

Several batteries were mounted on the sand spits commanding the entrance channel, the only point from which danger was dreaded.

Peyton need not have feared attack from the sea. Nearly every available vessel afloat on the Caspian in the Russian service was now safely in his hands, save one—a large transport at Baku.

This the Grand Duke filled with Cossacks, and their destination was Michaelovsk, a port on the east coast of the Caspian, but higher up than Uzun Ada.

They landed quietly enough, and advanced with the utmost rapidity towards Uzun Ada. Were it not for the excessive caution displayed by their commander they might have surprised the unconscious occupants of the latter place.

Had they done so and overcome Peyton and his few British officers and men, the nomads would have fled in terror back to their hills.

As it was, their scouts were discovered in time, and after a sharp affair they were beaten off, to return to Michaelovsk and go on board the steamer again.

They reported Uzun Ada to be crammed with English troops, and the Grand Duke Paul became nearly crazy with impotent rage. To add fuel to the fire, his sense of utter helplessness was increased by his complete inability to comprehend either the means whereby his opponents had so confounded his projects or the scope of their future intentions

Digitized by Google

In St. Petersburg consternation in Imperial circles was equally great.

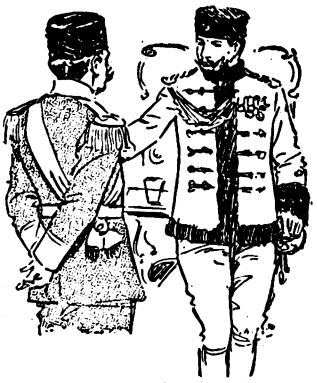
A rigorous press censorship kept definite information from reaching the public, but bad news percolates through unseen chinks, and it would have been far better for the Tsar if he had taken his people into his confidence and made the quarrel a national one.

As it was, the army, not less than the navy, felt itself to be ill led, and liable to be sacrificed piecemeal to the diplomatic requirements of the government, and from this source disaffection spread electrically through the provinces.

The Nihilist organisation fanned the smouldering embers of discontent, and the energy thus displayed paralysed the efforts of the secret police to cope with it.

The Tsar's throne, in no extravagant imagery, was built on the cone of a volcano.

Shortly after his unpleasant experience of Parisian fickleness, General Gourko was recalled to St. Petersburg. Russia was better served by her foreign correspondents than either France or Germany, and, in addition to the wholly unexpected development of affairs in Central Asia, she had reason to suspect that Br tish activity would not end there. At this period of the year she was vulnerable in the White and Black Seas. In the Far East, too, at Vladivostock and Port Arthur, she was exposed to loss and humiliation, and the return of Admiral Fremantle to those waters, after landing the Australian levies at Karachi, did not augur well for the happiness and prosperity of Russian enterprises thereabouts.



"I deem it a disgrace to our arms, sir!"

Altogether, things had not gone as they promised at the outset of the war, and the Tsar had sent for his most trusted emissary to confer with him upon the situation.

Notwithstanding the trying heat of the summer months, Nicholas II. stuck to his political capital, but he had left the pretentious palace for a bijou residence on the banks of the Neva.

Here, on the evening of June 26th, he received Gourko, with whom he had already discussed the position on the Caspian.

The Tsar was sterner even than his wont, and his cold, merciless eyes glittered with a dangerous light. Face to face with sudden and unexpected disaster, the iron nerve and inexorable will of the man gave him an aspect that seemed tragically heroic.

"Someone has blundered," he said to Gourko. "The enemy has provided us with a phrase. I seem to have intrusted my army to the direction of madmen."

"As an old soldier, your Majesty," replied the General calmly. "I know something of the vicissitudes of war. It is fatal to form a hasty judgment. Let me be frank. I fear that I—the War Office, all of us—have deceived ourselves. It is clear to me that the British have devined our intentions. They were prepared beforehand; their plans were long formed; and our attack on the Bristol Channel alone was needed to set them in motion. They have acted with extraordinary dispatch, and I imagine they have been aided by miraculous good luck. It is the fortune of war, and blame is surely mere waste of time. Our error was in deeming our enemies less wary and less ready."

"I deem it a disgrace to our arms, sir," exclaimed the Tsar impetuously. "We have lost half a century in a single week. What do you make of Alikhanoff?"

"Of him I say nothing, sire," was Gourko's reply. "His forces are exterminated, himself dead or a fugitive. That is how I read it. The British must have met him in Afghanistan and disastrously defeated him. Else the Central Asia Railway could not be in their hands. Nor is its capture explicable even on that understanding, unless there has also been a countermove, the nature of which I do not profess to understand. This, at least, is certain, that the British must have stirred the border tribes, who are ever unsettled and unsteady, to assist them. By their aid, some small detachment must have penetrated to the Caspian, and the whole of that region is in their hands."

"And within sight of Russia!" ejaculated the Tsar.

"We must not be unduly alarmed," said Gourko. "The British army itself must be at least three weeks distant from the Caspian—even if they possess the railway. There is ample time for retaliation. But it is clear we must face the situation with promptness and energy."

"I shall leave the supreme direction in your hands, General," said the Tsar gravely. "I am prepared to listen to any proposal you may have to make."

"Sire," replied Gourko earnestly. "Let me speak plainly. Much may be lost if we are not frank at a crisis like this. No stone will be left unturned by the British. They are full of resource, their pride is roused, they are stimulated by success. They may attack us at several points, and we must rouse ourselves to a supreme effort. It will be dangerous to neglect any element that may be of service to us. Our strongest card now is to appeal to the democratic instinct. Let this be a national war. If Russia herself is in arms, resolute and united, I myself laugh at invasion. But the people must not deem it a soldier's war. They must be taken into our confidence and bidden to our cause."

The Tsar's brow darkened at these words, and his thin lips became pressed for a moment in cruel obstinacy.

"Let me not hear words such as these from you again," he said after a pause. "I will sacrifice much, but I cannot be so cowardly as to yield the pious cause of my race, and bend the sovereignty of the Romanoffs to the degradation of abject concession."

"No," he continued sternly, as he saw that Gourko was about to interrupt, "I have received my crown as a sacred trust from my forefathers. I have sworn to keep its dignity unsullied, and its right undiminished. I will perish rather than be a traitor to my kin. The destiny of the Romanoffs is determined by Heaven itself. We have all of us risked death with equanimity—some of us have fallen in the fulfilment of our duty. It is a religious charge that I hold in my hands, and Russia shall exist beneath the supremacy of our family, or it shall disappear from the face of the earth. Let us say no more. I am wrong even in thus discussing it with you. If you have a proposal of practical value, I am ready to hear."

Gourko had listened with a sinking heart, but he knew that no appeal of his could be of any avail. He merely bowed in acquiescence, and proceeded to unfold his plan of campaign.

Whilst the Tsar and he were in earnest discussion on the counter-movements to be made in Central Asia, M. de Witte, the Foreign Minister, was announced.

"I come with grave news," he said, after respectfully saluting his sovereign. "Intelligence has reached the Foreign Office that Servia, Bulgaria, and Roumania have formed a confederacy and declared active war against us. A more serious thing still is that the British fleet has passed through the Dardanelles."

"Bound w ither?" demanded the Tsar, startled visibly by this terrible news.

"That is a matter for surmise, sire," replied M. de Witte. "It is possible that the fleet is destined for Batoum."

"Batoum!" cried Gourko with animation. "Never! They will never land behind the barrier of the Caucasus."

"Then where else?" asked the Tsar with impatience.

Digitized by Google

"They will deal a severer blow at us," said Gourko. "They will either land upon the Crimea, or, most possible of all, Odessa!"

General Gourko was a singularly well-informed man. Under other circumstances his intelligence and foresight would have been of the utmost value to his country.

The Mediterranean Fleet, commanded by Sir Michael Culme Seymour, having swept through the inland sea from Gibraltar, was at that moment approaching the Bosphorus without a whimper of discontent from Constantinople.

Indeed the forts on the Dardanelles had fired salutes in honour of the British flag. Fortunately the British Admiral expected something of the sort, so no misunderstanding occurred, which was as well for the forts.

Once out of sight of land in the Black Sea a halt was called for a final council on board the Ramillies, between the naval and military chiefs.

The result was quickly seen when the warships and the transports got under weigh again. Rear-Admiral Compton E. Domville, on the Trafalgar, led about one third of the fighting vessels, with two-thirds of the troops—some 80,000 men all told, Lord Methuen being in command—due north for Odessa, whilst the major portion of the armour-clads followed Sir Michael Seymour's flagship towards Sevastopol. The remainder of the troops, a fine army corps of 40,000 men, commanded by Sir Charles Warren, accompanied the Admiral, and excitement ran high on board when the cliffs of the Crimean Peninsular rose in view.

Soon it was possible to distinguish objects and places on shore. Men's hearts leapt tumultuously as they heard the familiar names of Alma, Inkerman, and Balaclava, and among the rank and file there was not the slightest doubt that the ground so hallowed with memories of the British army was again to witness the devotion and heroism of another generation.

But they were mistaken. After a splendid engagement between the Russian Black Sea Fleet, the Sevastopol forts, and the immensely stronger British force, Russia's Naval power in the near East ceased to exist. Even the fortifications received such a drubbing that the Governor of Sevastopol telegraphed for reinforcements to enable him to resist the expected landing.

England, however, had once too often made the mistake of expending her blood and treasure upon this isolated province of her huge enemy.

When the great naval force of Russia in the South had been reduced to impotence the fleet steamed off again, and this time made for Kertch.

A brief but effectual argument with the defenders of this port made it a simple matter for the ships to enter the Sea of Azov, and before the Britons, Australians, and Americans under Sir Charles Warren were quite sure of their geographical location they were actively engaged in capturing Taganrog and as much of the railway lines to Kharkov and Rostow as they could reasonably expect to hold as a preliminary.

The reason for this bold stroke became clear at St. Petersburg when news came simultaneously of the occupation of Odessa by Lord Methuen, who had been released from his divisional command in France to fill his present responsible position.

Odessa was not seized without some hard fighting.

It was strongly held by a Russian army corps, ever there in readiness to pounce upon the Turk. They had been warned to expect attack, and although no effective defence could be made against the fleet, it was a different matter when the British had landed and endeavoured to make even slight headway into the interior.

But troops like these, cheered by the knowledge of the deeds of their brethren in France and Germany, and inspired by the thought that they were fighting the first pitched battle against an hereditary enemy, are ill to stand against.

The famous Russian General, Kouropatkin, commanded the Odessa division, having been stationed there in order to lead the projected advance upon the Danube and the Bosphorus.

Had he withdrawn to Tiraspol he could have seriously hampered Lord Methuen's future operations. By furiously attacking the British at the earliest opportunity, he greatly helped them, for when he was routed with great loss, he opened up the whole province to them as far as Balta.

The transports, after performing their part of the programme, returned to Varna and Galatz, where they took on board vast numbers of the volunteers from the buffer state, who reinforced the British at Odessa and Taganrog, and also occupied Nikolaiev and Rostow.

By the third week in July, when the first detachment of the Indian Army had reached Uzun Ada, Lord Methuen and Sir Charles Warren were ready to strike into the interior on receipt of telegraphic instructions.

(To be continued.)

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes. It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora McIvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
From Rev. J. H. Burn. November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

£625

WILL BE GIVEN AWAY

In 10,000 Presents before Christmas, also

£100 IN FREE MONEY PRIZES.

Will be GIVEN AWAY as follows:

1st Prize £50 To Competitor solving four or more of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.
2nd Prize £25 To Competitor solving three of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.
3rd Prize £15 To Competitor solving two of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.
4th Prize £10 To Competitor solving only one of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

Having purchased the entire stock of a large Christmas Card Firm, at considerably less than half the original cost of production, as well as several other important lots at ridiculously low prices for cash, we have decided this year, for the first time, to deal direct with the Public instead of through the shopkeepers, and are making up monster packets (sold in the ordinary way for at least 3/6), containing one dozen choice assorted Christmas Cards, for 2/- per packet, Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom (Foreign Postage, 1 - extra). With each of these packets, by way of advertisement, we shall present gratis to every purchaser a most interesting, instructive, and amusing Christmas present. This article is sold retail at 1/3, and is in great demand for winter evenings.

In addition to this, the above £100 Free Cash Prizes will be given away amongst the competitors who can make out the correct names of one or more of the six stone fruits, which the following mixed letters will spell, viz.,

RRHYEC, EEEGGGANR, CHEAP, LUMP, TAPIOCR TARNICENE.

The only conditions Competitors have to comply with to qualify them to receive one of the above Christmas presents, and to compete for the Free Cash Prizes, are as follows: Send in your solutions, and enclose Postal Order for 2/- for our Monster Packet of Christmas Cards, together with stamped addressed envelope for sending your Prize Money at the close of the Competition. The packet of Cards, and the Christmas Present, will be sent upon receipt of your order, but the Prize Money will not be forwarded until a few days after the close of the Competition, which will positively be on Thursday, December 22nd, 1898. Competitors are advised to send in their orders without delay. Address: FINE ART COMPANY, 92A Isledon Road, Holloway, London.

Digitized by Google

LAST WRITTEN, FIRST READ.

P. R. T. writes to ask if we can tell him the origin of the expression "tip."———In an old English tavern a receptacle for small coin was placed in a conspicuous place, over which appeared in writing: "To insure promptness." Whatever was placed in the box was divided amongst the servants. Other taverns followed the example, and soon the words were abbreviated to T. I. P.; everybody knew what they indicated. Finally, the punctuation marks were dropped out, and the word "tip" became popular.

V. B.—So far as I know, no official record of any kind is kept of any meetings of the Cabinet.

N. C.—The reason given for the fact that the royal princes, when boys, are so commonly seen in Highland costume is, that it is the Queen's wish. Her Majesty's predilection for things Scottish is well known.

Geraldine asks: "Is it unhealthy to carry a muff?"———Unmistakably. Swinging the arms while walking is the best sort of exercise a girl can take, and this is an impossibility when clasped in a muff. Then, again, the muscles of the upper part of the body are spread out in all directions like a fan. If the shoulders are held together, the chest shrinks; the muff, in fact, develops a stoop and utterly ruins the symmetry of the whole figure.

W. Y.—No living representative of the animal kingdom has more than five toes, digits, or claws to each foot, hand, or limb, with the exception, of course, of monstrosities.

N. M.—The only venomous bird known is the Rpir N'Doch, or "Bird of Death," a native of New Guinea. It is the size of a pigeon, can only fly a few feet, and is easily caught. Its bite causes excruciating pains, loss of sight, and sometimes lockjaw. No person bitten by it has recovered, and death comes within a few hours.

D. W.—The coinage of new words in the English language continues at the rate of 100 annually.

B. C.—The wooden shoe industry still gives employment to a large number of people in France and in her lost province of Alsace. They are usually made by machinery, but in the Lozere district they are still made by hand. 1,700 persons are engaged in the industry in the last-named province, and their output is half a million yearly. The total number of wooden shoes made annually in the places mentioned is four millions.

S. P.—The restaurants of London provide about 1,000,000 lunches a day.

Jennie writes: "Is it true that the use of perfumes is dangerous?"———Yes, in a way, for by their use the secretory glands are weakened and overtaxed, and the hearing, the throat, and the lungs, and the sense of smell become affected.

D. W.—A carpet was not always a covering for the floor, but what we now term a table-cloth. A topic was always on the carpet when lying on the table for discussion, or when gossiped about by people sitting at a table. Hence the expression: "Sur le tapis."

"Whilst reading the other day," writes H. G., "of the great precautions that are taken to guard the life of the Tsar from the designs of the Nihilists, it occurred to me that if a Nihilist ever got a chance at him with a razor, in the guise of a barber, he would not stand much chance."———There is not likelihood of such a catastrophe as that. In the first place, the Tsar never uses a razor, his beard being carefully trimmed with scissors. Even this is treated as a responsible and important function, and one of the Grand Masters of the Court always attends His Majesty when he is under the care of the barber, who himself is a tried and trusted individual.

D. T. has been terribly shocked by reading a report to the effect that settlers in the West are in the habit of burning corn as fuel. To him it seems "perfectly sinful that grain, which might feed thousands of hungry people, should be destroyed in that way."———In this case, however, the apparent waste is justifiable. In the first place, corn in the ear can be burnt in stoves made for either soft or hard coal, and is especially good fuel for cooking stoves. Moreover, in the district referred to it can be raised in one-tenth of the time and at less expense than timber can be raised for the same purpose. Two bushels of corn will make a fire which will keep a family warm all day, even in very cold weather. Some recommend raising sunflowers for firewood, but they are not as good as corn.

H. M.—The average duration of life in European countries is greatest in Norway and Sweden and lowest in Italy and Austria. Consumption carries off a large number of people in Vienna, owing, it appears, to the quantity of fine dust particles in the air.

T.—There are at least forty varieties of tobacco plant.

R. H. T. asks: "Is it possible for hydrophobia to result from the bite of a dog that is not mad?"———No, hydrophobia is not a spontaneous disease, and cannot be given to a person by a dog unless the animal was mad when it caused the wound.

R. D. M.—Roumania is the highest taxed country in the world. Every bottle of foreign whisky has to pay a shilling duty; there is a tax on your door-plate, a tax on female servants, and doctors have to pay yearly for the privilege of exercising their profession.

Curate would like to know what the Pope's stipend amounts to.———His Holiness is not in receipt of any fixed annual income; the principal source of his revenue is the Peter's Pence, a collection taken up each year in every Roman Catholic church. The total usually reaches on an average about £300,000. Of this the Pope usually retains £20,000, and the remainder is divided amongst the cardinals, poor bishoprics, the administration of the Church, diplomatic expenses, schools, the maintenance of the Vatican and its dependencies.

M. S. would like to know if there is any country in which civilians are compelled to go about armed?———There is such a country, and that is Montenegro. Not only is every man compelled to carry about arms, but he is not even allowed to select his own weapon. Whether he wishes it or not, he is obliged to purchase from the Government a huge revolver eighteen inches long and weighing several pounds, which must be carried in front of his belt in a red Morocco case provided for that purpose, and woe betide the man who appears in the streets who is not thus armed.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Dec. 13th, if intended for the Issue on sale Dec. 27th, and dated Dec. 31st. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

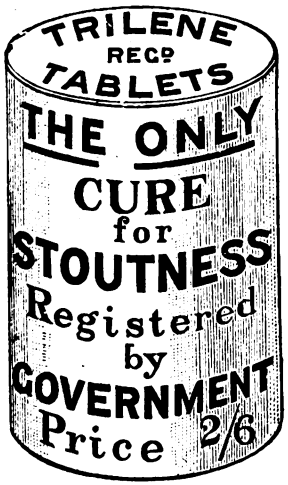
TRILENE TABLETS Regd



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Jhansi, India, Sept. 14th, 1897.

SERGEON-COLONEL E. S. BRANDER, M.D., writes: "As far as my experience goes, your Tablets form an excellent preparation for reducing weight."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb.

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

Miss B. MCKENZIE, of Greenhall, High Blantyre, N.B., says: "Completely cured, being reduced 2st."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr, Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with youTablets."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

GIGANTIC AUTUMN SALE, 1898.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories 10/12/98 when writing.

A Stock of 10,000 PATENT WADDED QUILTS, TORALIUMS, OR BED COVERS

(as Illustration).

Covered with Oriental Reversible Soft Sateen with double border. Size 54in. by 60in. These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Three Quilts for 10/-, or Six for 19/6, or Twelve for 38/-

Sale Price 3/6 Each. Postage 6d. ex.

At an Enormous Reduction to Clear Out.

The Dowager Lady GUISE writes: Leyden Dene, Bournemouth, Dec. 19th.—Please send three more of the wadded Quilts for 10/-, cheque enclosed.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price.

2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd.

In REVERSIBLE RICH TURKEY PATTERNS, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft. wide. These HEARTHRUGS have gained a world-wide reputation for MAGNIFICENCE, CHEAPNESS, and UTILITY, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Regd.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

6ft. by 9ft. ...	7/6		10½ft. by 12ft. ...	18/0
8ft. by 9ft. ...	9/0		12ft. by 12ft. ...	21/0
6ft. by 12ft. ...	10/6	REDUCED	9ft. by 15ft. ...	19/6
9ft. by 9ft. ...	11/0	SALE	12ft. by 13½ft. ...	22/0
9ft. by 10½ft. ...	13/6	PRICE.	12ft. by 15ft. ...	25/6
9ft. by 12ft. ...	15/0		12ft. by 18ft. ...	30/0
9ft. by 13½ft. ...	16/6		12ft. by 21ft. ...	35/6

Octagon Villa, The Lizard, R.S.O., 15/8/93.—J. CARWARDINE, Esq., writes: "I am very pleased with the Carpet you sent me. I have saved 50 per cent. by giving you the order. I paid half as much again to a local tradesman for Carpets the same quality a year ago. I have never been so pleased of any former purchase."

Colossal Sale of Rich Velvet Pile Real Sale Price

BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, width and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £8 14s. inclosed."

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.,	11/-		9ft. by 12ft.,	38/-
6ft. by 9ft.,	18/-	VELVET PILE	11ft. by 12ft.,	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.,	23/-	BRUSSELS	12ft. by 13½ft.,	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.,	28/-	CARPET	12ft. by 15ft.,	69/-
9ft. by 10½ft.,	33/-	SQUARES.	12ft. by 18ft.,	77/-

Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel of excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Ramsden, Chardbury, 4/3/98.—Lady HICKS BEACH writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson and Son send her one of their 'Queen's Royal' Carpets, 9ft. by 9ft., 11/-? Cheque enclosed. The other parcel received safely, and I am pleased with it."

Also RICH VELVET PILE STAIR CARPETS, bordered to match, 18in. wide, 1/3 per yard; 22½in. wide, 2/- per yard; 27in. wide 2/3 per yard.

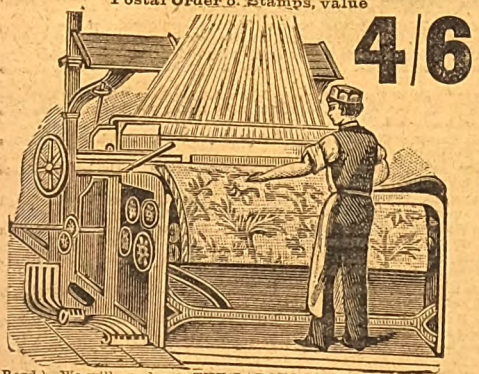
OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes. Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

H.R.H. Prince L. of Battenberg. H.R.H. Prince K. Bigit Siam. Marquis of Breadalbane. Sir Henry de Bathe. Sir Henry Bellingham. Sir E. H. Blair, Bart. H.I.H. Eugénie de Christoforo. Princess Palæologos Nicephoros Commence. Duchess of Wellington. Marchioness of Breadalbane. Marchioness of Hastings. Archbishop of York. Princess de Croy.

To Readers of "Short Stories," 10/12/98, on receipt of Postal Order o. Stamps, value



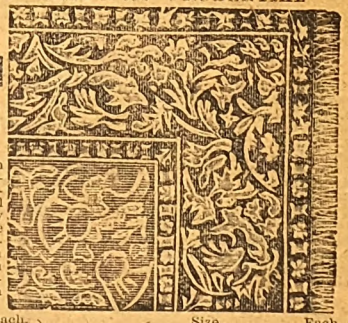
4/6

(Regd.) We will send you THE LARGEST GENUINE REVERSIBLE CARPET in BRUSSELS PATTERN WITH RUG ever sold at the price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

SPECIAL OFFER—2 CARPETS and 2 RUGS, 8s. [Cut this out.]

PRODIGIOUS SALE of the "PRUDENTIAL"

TURKEY PATTERN CARPETS (Regd).



Reversible, woven throughout, bordered, richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.....	4/9		9ft. by 15ft.....	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.....	5/11	REDUCED	12ft. by 12ft.....	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.....	7/6	SALE	12ft. by 13½ft.....	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.....	8/6	PRICE.	12ft. by 15ft.....	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.....	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.....	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.....	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.....	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8/-, or Twelve for 15/6, sterling value.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories when writing.

We rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone, No. 948.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Short Stories CARPET COUPON. 10/12/98.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

SPECIAL 1898.

SPECIALLY REDUCED INTRODUCTION

SALE PARCEL WITH FREE GIFT

enclosed, consisting of

1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin Hearthrug, average size 6 feet by 3 feet, perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush Bed Rug, Sofa Cover, or Table Cover, double warp, very heavy, size 50 inches by 78 inches.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin Door Mats, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant Hair Brush, highly finished, with mirror back.

THE LOT

10/6

Postage 9d. extra.

"Given" Away.

Providing SHORT STORIES Coupon, 10/12/98, as quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND with coloured eyes and gilt feet. Cash returned if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 520. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 17TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE NURSE.

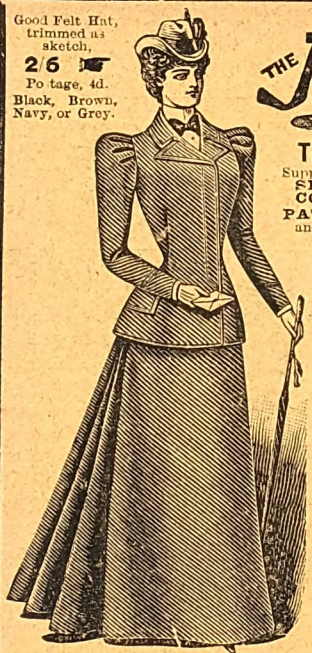
NURSE ROBERTS, 33 Cottage Grove, Bedford Park, Clapham, S.W.: "I cannot speak too highly of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa. My youngest son, who has been feeling very badly, assures me that he feels much better and stronger since he has taken Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and we shall continue to use it. I find it has a pleasant flavour, and it is also the most sustaining and invigorating beverage I have ever met with. I shall have much pleasure in recommending Vi-Cocoa to my friends and patients, and you may use this testimony if you like."

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa has become a household word, and this wonderful food beverage has come to take an important place in the dietary of the best regulated families. Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is a natural food, and by its merits alone—having been once fully and fairly placed before the public—it must become a national food, to the general advancement of British health and vigour.

The unique vitalising and restorative powers of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa are being recognised to an extent hitherto unknown in the history of any preparation. Merit, and merit alone, is what is claimed for Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and the proprietors are prepared to send to any reader who names Short Stories (a post-card will do) a dainty sample tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa free and post paid.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa can be obtained from all Chemists, Grocers, and Stores, or from 60, 61, and 62 Bunhill Row, E.C.

Good Felt Hat, trimmed as sketch, 2/6 Postage, 4d. Black, Brown, Navy, or Grey.



THE John Noble HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Promptly sent by Parcel Post direct from

THE LARGEST FIRM OF COSTUMIERS IN THE WORLD.

Supplied in the following two good durable cloths: I. JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, weighty, and weather-resisting. II. JOHN NOBLE COSTUME COATING, smooth-surfaced, and of lighter weight.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE, together with a new 84 pp. Illustrated Dress and Drapery List for Ladies and Children.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6 yards 52 inches wide) for 7/6; carriage, 8d. 7 6

THESE GARMENTS not only look well, but wear well, & yield loyal service.

3 GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

Model 984.

A thoroughly well-made and Tailor-finished Chesterfield Coat, and full wide latest style. 10 6 Price 10/6 complete Costume; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

THE JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

Made in strong Serge, with saddle-top, full sleeves, and pocket.

21	24	27	30in.
1 6	2/-	2 6	3/-
33	36	39	42in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-

each.

Lengths are from top of neck-band to edge of skirt in front. Carriage, 4d. extra.

WARM WOOL CAPS (as sketch), 1/-

Bankers:
"London & Midland" Bank Ltd.

Model W 1048.

The Countess Waterproof. A stylish, up-to-date garment, as sketch, or with plain Sacque back. Art check proofing. Guaranteed 12/11 odourless. Bishop sleeves and two pockets. In Black, Blue, Brown, Light and Dark Fawn Paramattas, or in Fawn Covert Coating at 12/11. Carriage, 5d.

Model 1016.

Very well-made Bodice, with prettily gathered front and shaped belt, and a full well-cut Skirt. The bodice is well lined.

LENGTHS (from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front) and PRICES:

35	38	42	46 in.
6/11	7/11	8/11	9/11 each.

Carriage, 6d. Trimmed Hat, as sketch, 5/11; carriage, 4d.

Model 999.

The smart Bodice has a well-cut back and full front; 10/6 saddle and sleeves lined. Price only 10/6 complete; Carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; Carriage, 5d.

COLOURS of all COSTUMES are Black, Navy, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Grey, Moss, Fawn, Purple, and Electric.

THE THREE STOCK SIZES are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), Waists 24, 26, 28 in., Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Any other size can be MADE TO MEASURE, 1/6 EXTRA.

A HANDSOME REAL SEALSKIN CAP supplied for 2/11; Girls' size, 2 6. Postage, 1d.

LADIES' OWN DESIGNS MADE UP by skilled Dressmakers in any kind of fabric at moderate cost.

A BOX OF 1,000 PATTERNS of all kinds of Winter Dress Goods lent to select from, and sent POST FREE.

Kindly name "SHORT STORIES" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK ST. MILLS, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine 39/- To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A 300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLE

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 520. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending December 17th, 1898.

A COMPLICATED BURGLARY.

UNLIKE a good many marriages of convenience, the union between Miss Madge Danvers and George Fenton third Baron Lovell, had proved quite a respectable success. The fair Madge had even owned to a decided weakness for the handsome lad of twenty-three, and though he was not very rich as barons go, there was no denying the solid social advantages of the coronet, or the sweet sound of the pleasant prefix that went with it.

Lord Lovell had £5,000 a year and tastes up to £10,000, and her ladyship had £500 a year under her mother's will, and social ambitions that would have sat easily on the wife of a millionaire.

His lordship's ground rent and royalties were not quite unencumbered when he married, and as he and his wife found all too little difficulty in getting through their joint income and into debt on the other side of it, each year of wedded life saw the family acres dipped a little deeper than the preceding one.

Wherefore it came to pass in the fourth year of their union, what time Junius the favourite ran a bad fourth for the Cesarewitch, that his lordship found himself £500 short of the sum necessary to see him satisfactorily through settling-day. Most unfortunately, too, it happened that her ladyship, just at that very time, wanted a couple of hundred pounds very badly to stave off serious inconveniences arising out of sundry unpaid accounts for the barest necessaries of fashionable life.

This unpleasant combination of circumstances, further

Edited By G. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

complicated by a total lack of conjugal confidence, led to the flying of two separate "kites," the strings of which, curiously enough, were both held by the same hand.

It was Thursday afternoon, and Lord Lovell had not got together a single hundred of the £500 that alone could save him from dishonour on the fatal Monday.

He had returned to his club tired and disgusted after a fruitless pilgrimage to the City, and there he chanced upon a friend who showed him a way out of his troubles.

Francis Jameson was a captain of Lancers, retired on half-pay, and the Egyptian medal in consequence of a spear-thrust that had ended his riding days for good. Just after his retirement he had come into a few thousands on the decease of an ancient and admiring maiden aunt, and since then he had lived at the rate of about £2,000 a year without contracting a single debt. What Eldorado he had invested his money in no one knew, and as long as he kept up appearances no one cared.

The ex-captain of Lancers was of course very sorry to hear of his lordship's difficulties, and would have been only too happy to have helped him out of them, if only for the sake of obliging his wife's husband; for Lady Lovell, while she was yet Madge Danvers, had refused him so sweetly and tenderly that he felt sure that he was rejected on purely social and pecuniary grounds.

Unfortunately, however, his money was all locked up; but at the same time he did happen to know of an obliging solicitor on the other side of the water who often had a thousand or two to dispose of on behalf of his clients.

The upshot of this conversation was that shortly before noon on the following day his lordship crossed the water, presented Jameson's card to Mr. Thomas Gaston, solicitor, 29A, High Street, Newington, and after a few minutes' discussion of his case, was informed, somewhat to his surprise, that the money would be at his disposal by twelve o'clock the following day on his personal security. The interest would only be 5 per cent. a month, which was very reasonable, considering all the circumstances.

About two hours after his lordship had left the dingy South-side street, and departed, wondering yet rejoicing, to more congenial latitudes, a lady, attended by a smart French maid, descended from a hansom at Mr. Gaston's hospitable door.

A quarter of an hour later the lady and her maid re-entered their cab. In the lady's little handbag there reposed four £50 notes, and in the drawer of Mr. Gaston's safe lay a slip of blue stamped paper endorsed "Margaret Fenton."

* * * * *

Three months had passed since Lord and Lady Lovell had paid their separate visits to Newington, and the two bills in Mr. Gaston's hands would fall due in three days' time. Disaster after disaster had befallen his lordship since he had borrowed that £500, until now the nominal master of £5,000 a year did not know where to lay his hands upon a paltry hundred for current expenses, to say nothing about meeting the impending bill.

The three months had been a period of increasing difficulty to both Lord and Lady Lovell. They had each applied to Mr. Gaston for a renewal of their respective bills, and each had been politely but firmly informed that unless adequate security were forthcoming, the bills would have to be met in due course.

Now the only security that they possessed between them were the family jewels, worth between three and four thousand pounds, but as neither cared to tell the other how matters stood it was rather difficult to see how they could be made available.

Two days before the bills had to be met his lordship, in a fit of desperation, laid all his troubles bare before his friend Jameson, and incidentally lamented the fact that the family jewels had been settled on Lady Lovell on her marriage, subject to the condition that she should not dispose of them without the consent of two trustees, to whom under the present circumstances an appeal was not to be thought of.

"Then, my dear fellow," said Jameson, after considering the subject for a few moments in silence, "the only course open to you as far as I can see is to do as others have had to do before you, and have the jewels stolen for you by a trustworthy burglar, realise them on the quiet, and retire to the Continent until your troubles have blown over. The game is up for the present as far as I can see, and you must just lie by quietly until your estates have cleared themselves."

This curious method of extrication had not occurred to his lordship; but the moment it was suggested to him the very strangeness of the idea fascinated him, and he made no more objection than to question the feasibility of the plan.

Jameson very soon allayed his feelings on this score by telling him the inner history of a once celebrated jewel robbery, in which neither jewels nor thieves were ever traced, and when Lord Lovell parted an hour later from his friend in need, the details of the sham burglary were all arranged, and the event was fixed to come off the following night, when the Lovells and the gallant Captain would be at a ball until the small hours of the morning. Jameson was to provide the burglar, and all that his lordship would have to do was to hand over his latch-key, himself and his wife keep out of the way until three o'clock in the morning, and meet him the next day to receive the plunder.

Now by one of those strange coincidences which happen rather more frequently in real life than they do in fiction, at the very time that this little plot was being arranged in the smoking room of Lord Lovell's club, an almost identical conspiracy was being hatched in his wife's boudoir between her ladyship and her clever, if somewhat unscrupulous, French maid.

Long before her husband had thought of them, Lady Lovell had looked with longing eyes on her splendid jewels, and most fervently wished that no trustees existed to question her disposal of them according to her own needs and desires.

Two or three times she had bewailed to her confidante her inability to dispose of enough of them to help her out of her present scrape without exposure and social disgrace, and now the faithful Josephine rose to the occasion, and, for a consideration, boldly volunteered to steal the jewels on behalf of her almost distracted mistress.

It did not take the clever Frenchwoman many minutes to convince the harassed, ignorant girl of the ease with which the plan could be carried into execution, and so before his lordship returned to dinner she had consented that Josephine should find her jewel-case unlocked, and abstract the precious contents while she was away at Lady Fitz-Alan's ball the following night.

Little conspiracies of this kind would generally go off satisfactorily if the parties to them would only keep faith with each other, but they do not always do so, and in the present case it must be regretfully recorded that twelve hours had not elapsed before Lord Lovell had formed a counterplot on his own account by which he hoped to obviate the necessity of trusting to the bonâ fides of Captain Jameson's burglar, and to get the jewels for himself without letting them go outside the house.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Joseph Crooks, alias "Crooky Joe," whose services had been retained for the removal of the jewels in accordance with Captain Jameson's plan, found no difficulty in the execution of the first and most important part of his delicate enterprise. Watching his opportunity, he let himself in with the latch-key, stole upstairs to her ladyship's boudoir, and was pleased to find that someone's carelessness had saved him the trouble of picking the lock of the jewel-case. In a very few minutes he had slipped the morocco cases into his capacious pockets and was on his way downstairs again, chuckling to himself over the easiest job he had ever had in all his professional experience.

Everything having gone so well thus far, it would be easier to imagine than describe his disgust at finding himself confronted on the first-floor landing by a gentleman in evening dress, holding a cocked revolver, the barrel of which was in a disagreeably straight line with his own person. He halted, and his hand instinctively sought the back pocket of his short tail coat.

"If you take that hand out of your pocket I shall shoot," said the gentleman, in a voice whose low, steady tones told Joseph that the game was practically up so far as his present undertaking was concerned. Under the circumstances he wisely concluded to parley with a view to conditional surrender, so he said as gently as he knew how:—

"Chuck it, guv'nor! I ain't got no pistil, and I'll give up all I've took if yer'll lemme 'ook it quietly."

"I've no doubt you would, and a very good get-out for you too; but that is a matter which wants a little discussion. Turn round and go into that room, the last door on the corridor. Go quietly or you may wake someone."

The speaker was in a position to give orders, and Joseph stood on such delicate ground that there was no course open for him but obedience. He went to the door indicated, opened it, and walked into a snug little sanctum in which a jet of gas was burning.

"Sit down and make yourself comfortable," said his host, pointing to an armchair with the barrel of his revolver, "I want to have a chat with you, and we shall not be disturbed for half-an-hour if we don't talk too loud. Is this little affair your own idea?"

"No, sir, it ain't. I was put up to it by a party I knows, who said as 'ow 'e 'ad got instructions from a gentleman wot said 'e wanted the job done fur a swell friend of 'is as wos compelled to reerlise on 'is joolery on the quiet, like. I wos to sneak the stuff and give it to the chap wot come to me, and 'e wos to give me a tenner fur the job. That's all I knows about it, straight."

"A very fair story, but rather too mixed to be true. If the man wanted his jewellery stolen, why ever shouldn't he take it himself instead of giving you the chance to run off with the lot?"

"I allow it don't look true, mister, but it's as right as gospel for all that, s'elp me!"

"Well, we won't argue the point, we might be interrupted, and if I'm going to let you go it's time you were off"—Joseph assented with some feeling, and his host went on—"Now, what I propose is this. I don't want to get you into trouble, and a prosecution would be a lot of worry to both of us, especially to you. Therefore we'll take your story as true, you will put what you have taken on that table, and I will give you a couple of sovereigns if you will go and tell the people who sent you that the jewels were stolen, or, at any rate, had disappeared, when you got here. Will that suit you?"

"Down to the ground, mister. I don't know wot yer game is, but that's no bizness of mine. You've be'aved honourable to me, and 'ere's the stuff—every bit as I took."

As he spoke, Joseph pulled out a dozen morocco cases of different sizes from his pockets and laid them, with a creditably small show of reluctance, on the table. When he had put the last one down his host handed him two sovereigns, took up one of the cases and opened it.

Instead of the diamond necklace it ought to have held, it contained a cheap, flashy string of crystals not worth five shillings.

With an unprintable exclamation, Lord Lovell threw it on the table and rapidly opened the other cases. Not one of them held the jewels he looked for.

The faces of the nobleman and the burglar as they looked at each other and the sham jewellery by turns, bore a curious likeness in spite of the natural difference of their features. They had both been very badly sold, and they looked it.

The feelings of his lordship as he showed Joseph out of the side door of the house were decidedly mixed and by no means cheerful, still, for the next few hours, there was nothing to be done, so he went upstairs, put the cases with their worthless contents back into the jewel box, and returned a sad and sorely puzzled man to escort his wife home from Lady Fitz-Allan's ball.

When her ladyship reached home and sent for her maid, Josephine entered the room with a curious, wicked-looking glint in her eyes, and in rapid, broken accents told her the story of the vanished jewels and the failure of their scheme. The next day Lady Lovell was confined to her room, and it was not until the evening that her husband was able to condole with her on the subject of their joint loss.

They never saw them again, and their disappearance opened the flood-gates of ruin so wide that there was nothing for it but a speedy retirement to the Continent or the endurance of social ostracism at home.

They agreed in choosing the former, so his lordship gave his good friend Jameson a power of attorney to deal with his estates for the benefit of his creditors, reserving only £500 a year for himself, and departed to the South of France.

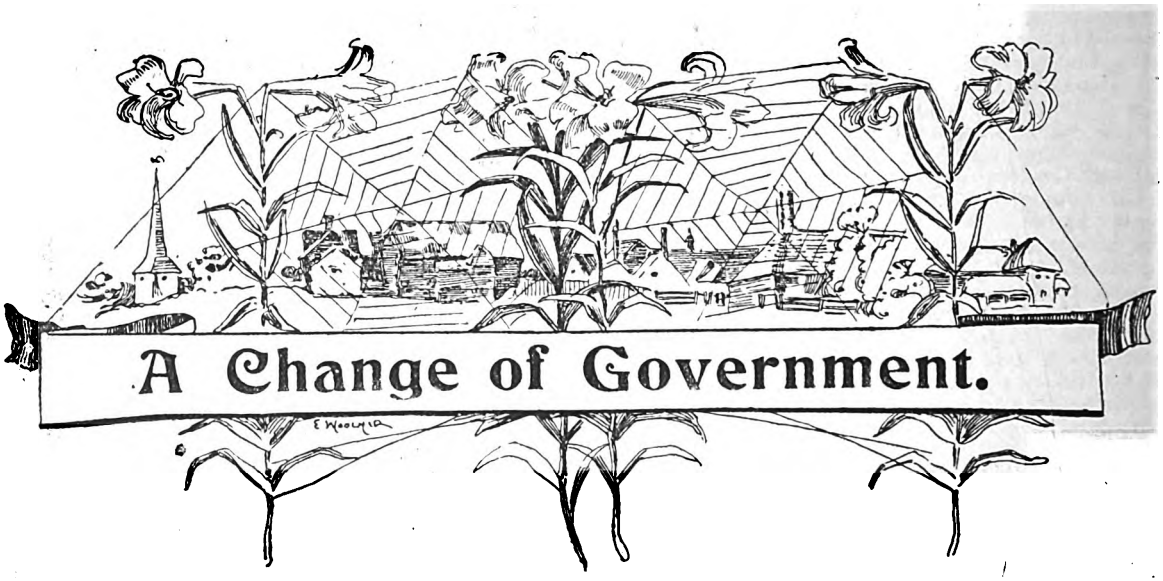
Mr. Thomas Gaston, of Newington, was made manager of the estates, which he ruthlessly squeezed very much to the advantage of himself and of his employer, the ex-captain of Lancers, private moneylender, and organiser of complicated burglaries.

But even Mr. Gaston did not know how Lady Lovell's jewels got from her boudoir to the lower drawer of the safe that still held her ladyship's dishonoured acceptance, until one day last winter, nearly seven years after the jewels vanished so mysteriously, Mdlle. Josephine, desiring to retire from business into respectable married life in her own land, turned up at the office in High Street, Newington, and demanded £1,000 down as the price of her silence as to how Captain Jameson employed her to substitute the false for the real gems half an hour before Mr. Joseph Crooks made the greatest blunder of his whole professional career.

The fact that the money was paid within three hours gives a strong colouring of probability to Mdlle. Josephine's explanation of the mystery.

LEVIN CARNAC.

Digitized by Google



A Change of Government.

"AH, you're just in time for the revolution!"

This was the whispered greeting Don Munios gave me half and hour after my arrival in La Guayro.

"Revolution," said I, "what revolution?"

"Why yours, of course," he answered with a chuckle.

"My revolution! Look here, Munios, out with your joke."

"But it's no joke. We've got the man, we've got the guns, and the trap is all but ready to be sprung. A week from St. Sebastian's and the business will be on. It won't take long. We bag the Prince, that rascal Castillie, his councillor, and General Sargos at one clip. At the next, we get the Prince's brother and one or two of the smaller fry in the army. Then, vive la république!"

"And what is to happen to these people you mention?"

"Oh, just removed—gprrrp, you know," and Don Munios drew his hand across his throat with a suggestive leer. Yet I have seen his eyes fill with tears at the sight of a pin scratch on a child's arm.

In an instant my business instinct was up in arms. "Look here!" I said hotly, "you don't suppose that I take any part in your g-r-r business, do you? Why, that sort of thing would simply kill my enterprise. As a friend, I advise you to drop your revolution at once."

"What!" Don Munios threw his cigarette out of the window and jumped to his feet. "Let Guayro suffer longer under this good-for-nothing Prince? Why, see what he's done for the country during the last five years! Look at the banana plantations—abandoned! Look at the gold mines—idle! Look at the railway—two streaks of rust and a mortgage! The treasury is bankrupt, the government corrupt, and things are gone to the dogs generally, all that our feather-head of a Prince may amuse himself with his boon companions and make a study of new sensations."

Calm or ruffled, these people of Spanish blood are always picturesque. Their fires of passion are ever lightly banked. Just open a damper and the flames leap from coals which a moment before seemed black and dead. And Don Munios was a true Spaniard.

"Your Prince may be all you say," I returned, "and your affairs may have gone to the dogs, but mine are all right, and a revolution would play ducks and drakes with them. Why not use peaceable means—agree to get along without a Prince, and send him back to Spain marked 'unavailable?'"

"Impossible! I'd be as much opposed to bloodshed as you are, but I know the situation. The officers are the Prince's boon companions. As for the soldiers, they idolise their officers—and there you are! No, the people have made up their minds that for the good of La Guayro, the Prince and his soldier friends must die. In confidence I tell you that in ten days the blow will fall. If in that time you can propose any plan for setting up a republic peacefully, I promise to put it fairly before the Revolutionary Council."

This was the situation over which we argued until the stars faded; and it still "hung heavy over my head" when I awoke to find the tropic sun beating straight down upon the adobe walls of my host's home.

I had come to La Guayro as representative of a commercial company, with a concession from the government of La Guayro, given in return for a sum that assured royal reception in the bankrupt kingdom. It was doing well in its mines, and I didn't want my business prospects upset.

To make the company's position doubly secure, I had, in a sort of inspection tour some months previously, engaged Don Munios as local agent with a salary that had secured his protestations of everlasting loyalty. Indeed, even now he tried to make himself believe that the prospective revolution was for the company's good, but to me civil strife meant nothing less than indefinite delay in digging, if indeed the mere rumour of it did not knock the bottom out of our stocks in the London market. At any rate, gunpowder costs money, and whoever won would make us pay their bills in the shape of taxes.

Viewed from any standpoint, the situation accumulated seriousness at such a rate, that before I had been up an hour I had cabled in cypher to the London office that a revolution was imminent, and that unless it could be prevented our interests would be imperilled. With as much urgency as I could put into a cable message, I begged that the manager of the company, who was to be somewhere in America about that time, should be instructed to come to my help at once.

Digitized by Google

For two days I fairly lived at the cable office, waiting feverishly for an answer; but the oracle remained dumb. I was afraid that he could not possibly arrive in time, yet I waited anxiously for some reply.

On the third morning I walked down to the steamship office—to lay my plans in case it seemed necessary to get away before the row began. To my surprise I saw a big white yacht ploughing her way up the bay. She did not deign to poke her aristocratic nose up to the tumble-down quay, but came to a stop off-shore, not even dropping her anchor. I caught sight of a curiously familiar figure, followed by a man carrying a case, saunter out of the cabin, shake hands with half-a-dozen men aboard, wave an airy good-bye, and step into the boat, turning to me a face that—yes, there was no mistaking him—it was the face of Mr. Walter Rayner, the manager of our company, and the one man in the world who, if the means existed for accomplishing a bloodless revolution in La Guayro, would find these means.

When he stepped off the quay I could only babble my delight that he had arrived so soon after receiving my message.

"Message?" repeated Rayner, as I helped his man tumble their belongings into the broken-down vehicle that did duty for a public conveyance. "I got no message. Been cruising for days with Hill and his friends. He came out of his way on purpose to drop me off here, and now he's gone back after other sport. But what about your message? Nothing wrong I hope? For I'm having a rest. Doctor's orders. Told me to hunt up the dullest, sleepiest place I could and go there. Well, what are you smiling about?"

As well as I could, owing to the way in which we were being jolted over vilely-paved streets, and also considering the proximity of Rayner's man on the front seat, I explained the La Guayro tangle, winding up with the point blank question whether he could straighten it out. To which Rayner responded only with the counter question, when could he see Don Munios? When informed that we were to be guests at that worthy's residence, he relapsed into silence.

Rayner did not keep the workings of his mind in a glass case.

The surprise of Don Munios on seeing my companion had a touch of fear in it. The Latin American is only a generation removed from the believer in the black arts.

When I had told him that I had cabled for Rayner to come to stop the row, he had smiled; it wasn't possible. Yet here he was, several days before time—and in advance of the revolution,

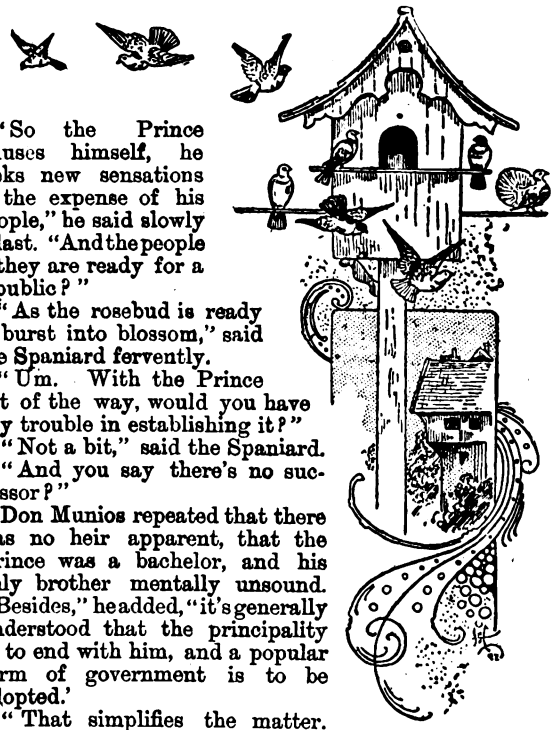
"Your steamships must have the wings of the wind," was all he said, however.

And neither Rayner nor I denied it.

After dinner, seated under the palm trees in the courtyard, Don Munios gave a report of the preparations for the revolution, which he vainly attempted not to make enthusiastic; ending his account, as I had mine, by asking if Rayner had any peaceable plan to suggest.

"Give me time," said my friend slowly. "You don't suppose I have conspiracies on tap, do you? Besides, there are one or two things I want to know."

Then ensued something like a game of twenty questions, in which Rayner in an hour acquired more information concerning La Guayro, its finances, agriculture, banking system, etiquette, leading men, and the character, foibles, and habits of its ruler than I had obtained during the two months of my previous stay.



"So the Prince amuses himself, he seeks new sensations at the expense of his people," he said slowly at last. "And the people—they are ready for a republic?"

"As the rosebud is ready to burst into blossom," said the Spaniard fervently.

"Um. With the Prince out of the way, would you have any trouble in establishing it?"

"Not a bit," said the Spaniard.

"And you say there's no successor?"

Don Munios repeated that there was no heir apparent, that the Prince was a bachelor, and his only brother mentally unsound. "Besides," he added, "it's generally understood that the principality is to end with him, and a popular form of government is to be adopted.'

"That simplifies the matter. Now let me have a chance to think things over."

Rayner's way of thinking things over was characteristic. It seemed to consist in literally seeing the town from its markets and quays, to the cathedral and palaces, and in casually chatting with representatives of every class, from the mule drivers to the chief conspirators, and the Prince himself. It even allowed him to spend an hour or so each evening in Munios' library, never reading, but apparently revelling in the atmosphere of books.

On the evening of the third day Rayner and I sat and smoked silently in this library. Apparently he was idly gazing at the ceiling. Then he walked about the room, glancing at the rows of books that lined the walls. He looked with the critical eye of a book fancier at the backs of one or two, and finally sat down with a volume on his knee.

"I've got it," he said quietly after a time, closing the volume and blowing a ring of smoke towards the ceiling.

"Got it? I knew you would. What is it?"

"That's it—up there," pointing to the thinning of a smoke ring.

"But where did you get it?"

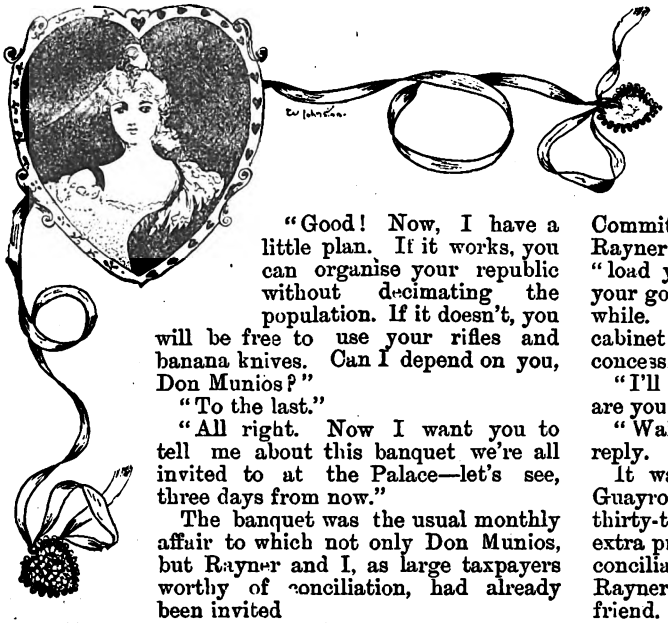
"Out of that book. That's where the best of us go for an idea. Men have been thinking for ages, and writing what they thought for centuries. Don't try to do all your thinking yourself. Use other men's brains when you can. It pays."

"Which book? Let me see." But he had put the volume back, and would only indicate his source of inspiration by an indefinite wave of the hand. He said nothing more until Don Munios returned late that night from a meeting of the conspirators.

"The Prince suspects nothing at all?" asked Rayner of the arch conspirator.

"I shouldn't be at liberty if he did."

Digitized by Google



"Good! Now, I have a little plan. If it works, you can organise your republic without decimating the population. If it doesn't, you will be free to use your rifles and banana knives. Can I depend on you, Don Munios?"

"To the last."

"All right. Now I want you to tell me about this banquet we're all invited to at the Palace—let's see, three days from now."

The banquet was the usual monthly affair to which not only Don Munios, but Rayner and I, as large taxpayers worthy of conciliation, had already been invited

Don Munios repeated this information, with appropriate phrases concerning wines and sweets wrung from the starving people.

"Yes, I know," said Rayner, "but I want details. Where is it to be held?"

"In the big banqueting hall of the Palace."

"Oh, yes! It was being redecorated when I went over it, so I didn't see it. Quite a fine place, isn't it? Is it lighted by electricity?"

"Yes"—more phrases concerning the Prince's criminal extravagance.

"One thing more. Who is the Prince's royal sky-pilot, chief priest, or that sort of thing?"

The Spaniard's eyes expressed mental dizziness at this irreverence.

"The Archbishop of La Guayro. But why—"

"All right, I'd like to meet him to-morrow. Can you arrange it?"

"Certainly; only—"

"One thing more. You say the Prince likes to be amused. Do you suppose that you could arrange to have him ask my man Drake to be present as entertainer? Oh, Drake's no clothesbrusher," to a look in the Spaniard's eyes. "He's a gentleman, Drake is, a college graduate, and all that; but something went wrong with him in early life—crossed in love, perhaps, and he's never got on in life. Among other things he has been a magician on the variety stage. My friends and I found him very entertaining on the yacht, I assure you, and he'll give the Prince a new sensation or two. Now, why not introduce him as the distinguished French prestidigitateur, Monsieur Brion? Will that go?"

"Certainly," said Don Munios, catching some of his infectious enthusiasm. "The Prince will insist on summoning him if he numbers the black art among his accomplishments. Our sovereign dotes on that sort of thing. Only I don't understand."

"Oh, I thought we might give him one night's fun before he leaves the Prince business," said Rayner yawning. "Suppose we get some sleep, gentlemen? I'm tired."

And neither that night nor in the three days following would Rayner utter a word to either of us concerning his plans. In fact he seemed to have forgotten it himself.

Drake, meantime, had received his invitation, and was making such preparations as were possible without apparatus.

When Don Munios, becoming uneasy as the next day of grace approached, remonstrated and reminded him that the Revolutionary Committee was going on ahead with its preparations, Rayner nodded his acquiescence. "All right," he said; "load your guns, sharpen your swords and organise your government. I suppose you'll have a dictator for a while. All I want is the assurance that your first cabinet will sign an iron-bound contract to respect our concession, and let us dig twelve months in the year."

"I'll answer for that," said Don Munios. "But when are you going to get the Prince out of the way?"

"Wait till after the banquet," was the enigmatic reply.

It was a superb affair, even for the Prince of La Guayro—that banquet—for the fact that it marked the thirty-third birthday of the sovereign gave an excuse for extra preparation. As large taxpayers and persons to be conciliated, Rayner and I were given seats of honour, Rayner on the Prince's right hand, and I next to my friend. On either side of the long tables gleaming with the royal palace plate and glass and flowers, extended a line of dark, heavily-moustached men, many handsome, most of them young, and looking very brave and gay in their broadcloth, brass buttons, and gold lace. The viands were of distinguished excellence, and the wine of a flavour that belongs only to the output of certain world-renowned vineyards. At the same time there was no vulgar excess. It was not for nothing that the Prince had made the pursuit of pleasure the chief business of his life.

By the time the last course was reached, all things had worked together to bring the company into just the humour for greeting with enthusiasm the gentleman introduced as "M. Brion, the far-famed magician, and friend of Mr. Rayner, of the English company."

And M. Brion, otherwise Drake, proved himself worthy of Rayner's praise. Without any outfit but playing cards, rings, coins, handkerchiefs, and other small objects borrowed on the spot, he kept the entire assembly mystified and entranced. The Prince he captured at the start, by making a strawberry grow out of that gentleman's salt-cellar. Don Munios for the moment forgot the revolution in wonder of beholding a mango seed, hidden in his table napkin, sprout, and finally shoot up into a perfect plant.

Finally, after a number of tricks involving the disappearance of coins, interchange of rings, and the like, Drake took up a pack of playing cards, and proceeded to such card throwing as I have never seen.

Standing at the foot of the long table, he dealt a card to each of the thirty guests without moving from his position, landing the pasteboard deftly in the finger glass before each man. Then he threw one which sailed gracefully to a point just above the Prince's head, and then returned to the hand of the magician.

The native boomerang thrower of Australia would have been moved to envy to see the Queen of Hearts float back with such precision to the hand that sent her. Besides, he read cards through the back, made a rainbow of them about his head, and performed half-a-dozen clever tricks that took by storm the La Guayreans. Suddenly, as if by way of climax, he turned, gave a long, shrill whistle, and, with a graceful gesture, sent the entire pack fluttering like a flock of birds straight at the walls of the banquet hall. Before the first one fell to the floor the lights went out with a snap, and the company was left in total darkness.

Digitized by Google

For a moment there was absolute silence, then the faint click of metal betrayed the fact that there was a furtive reaching for swords. The Spaniard trusts no man in the dark.

The next minute, however, all were reassured, and ardent Spanish interjections broke from the lips of the Prince and his delighted guests. Where had been the solid wall of the Palace now appeared a fairy-like landscape. Trees, mountains, a lake, a river and waterfall gleamed out of the darkness as by enchantment, then faded as quickly as they had appeared. But with only an instant's interval the scene appeared again, this time faintly, as a landscape seen in the gray early morning. Then one of the upper clouds was streaked with pink; then another. The light grew stronger, the whole sky and scene were gradually lighted up, until we saw it once more as if in the glare of the noonday sun.

Darkness again, illuminated this time by the crimson glow of a sunset. Then another interval of blackness and the electric globes in the crystal chandelier above us blazed out again, and instead of gazing at the magic landscape, our eyes detected what had seemed a section of the solid wall of the Palace was a sort of drop curtain painted to match the other decorations. These waterfalls, dawns, and noons, and sunsets had not been the product of black art, but merely the work of a clever scene painter and skilful electrician.

As the storm of applause following M. Brion's withdrawal died away, the Prince rose, glass held high.

"A health to M. Brion and Mr. Rayner," he cried, his handsome face flushed.

With a bell-like tinkling of glasses the toast was drunk, and we had pushed back our chairs and begun to move about and break up into groups, when the voice of Castillio, the chief councillor of the Prince, drew all our eyes to our end of the table.

"The Prince! Look!"

Without a sound His Highness had sunk in his chair, his arms limp, his head hanging on one side, his face, lately gay and glowing, now turned an ashy grey.

The next moment he fell into the arms of General Sarjos who sat at the Prince's left.

In an instant a contagion of excitement spread to the entire Palace. While attendants removed the Prince to his apartments, a messenger was despatched for the Royal Physician and the Archbishop, and the banqueters, now thoroughly sobered, withdrew to the reception-room to await developments.

"A slight heart seizure or a mild stroke of apoplexy," was the news with which we were finally dismissed. And it was added that the Royal Physician expected that the Prince would soon revive. But those acquainted with the ways of Palaces wagged their heads knowingly over the non-committal nature of the report.

By nine o'clock next morning the seriousness of the Prince's condition could no longer be concealed, but was proclaimed in bulletins to the excited crowd who had been waiting at the Palace gates since dawn. At noon the Prince was still unconscious, and the bulletins indicated grave doubts of his recovery. At 2 p.m. the situation was the same. His respiration was faint and the heart's action almost imperceptible.

At three o'clock it was rumoured that the Archbishop had proposed that as a last expedient he should resort to an old custom still prevalent among the Spanish-speaking people. In accordance with this usage, when a man of prominence is supposed to be dying, has apparently but one chance in a hundred of living, and wants to make the most of it, he has his head shaved, is dressed in monk's robes, and takes a solemn vow, if his life is spared, to enter a monastery.

There's no renouncing his vows if he lives.

If he is unconscious—and herein lay the special application of the custom—his friends may take the necessary steps without his sanction.

In short, the priests asked that in order to save the Prince's life for this world, or his soul for the next, they should make a monk of him; and though Castillio and the army officers protested vigorously, many prominent citizens, some of whom Don Munios had been accustomed to meet with in secret, enthusiastically seconded the appeal of the priests. As for the ignorant and superstitious common people, who believed fervently in the potency of the old custom, they thronged about the cathedral and raised their voices in a fervour of entreaty.

At 4 p.m. it was officially announced that the Archbishop would wait until six, and that if by that time the Prince was still unconscious and alive, he would perform the ceremony.

When that hour had arrived and the Prince's condition was unchanged, word swept through the dense crowd that filled the plaza and, overflowing, pressed against the very gates of the palace, that the operation of transforming the Prince into a monk had begun.

But about seven o'clock the Prince showed signs of returning vitality. In another hour he opened his eyes, and by nine o'clock he was sitting up, rubbing his hands over his head in bewilderment, and weakly gasping a "health to M. Brion and Mr. Rayner."

Meantime Don Munios and his followers, realising the drift of affairs, had quietly gathered their forces, seized the Arsenal, and before Castillio and the Prince's military friends understood what was happening, occupied the royal council chamber—all without a struggle.

Just at midnight, as the Prince, by order of the Archbishop, was carried off to the monastery, uttering remonstrance grievously out of character with his new rôle, Don Munios and his friends proclaimed the establishment of the Republic of La Guayro. The thing had been done without the pop of a gun or the loss of a single life.

"Rayner," said I, as we sat in Munios's library late that night, "now that all is over, do you mind telling me your plan? Natural causes have——"

"Natural causes!" returned my friend scornfully. "I arranged it with Drake and the Palace electrician, a clever young Scotsman, and while the lights went out I dropped a potion into the Prince's cup."

"But the custom?"

"I discovered that night in the library—recorded in Volume iii., Chapter 4, of that set of Curiosities of Spanish History. In chumming with the Archbishop I found that it was still 'practical.' But I say," said Rayner with a twinkle of appreciation, "do you suppose that the Prince, in all his varied experience, ever had a sensation that matched his, when he found out his fate?"

PETER CONNOLLY.

Digitized by Google

What Love will Do.

MAX VANNER leant against an oaken door-way, and out of his dark, magnetic eyes, carelessly scanned the gliding throng until——

Yes, there she was! He could not mistake that exquisite form—that beautiful face.

As usual she was surrounded by her "Knights of the Carpet" court, poor moths. He was stronger than their strongest, yet he had been singed, and——

Carelessly he sauntered to her side.

She lifted her violet eyes; such strange, half sad, half tender, wholly proud, defiant eyes, that their fringing glance had long since pierced his heart.

But just now the eyes languidly lifted to his were tinged with boredom; the faintest curl of contempt just curved the beautiful, mobile lips, and she turned from her eager suitors with an insolent, unmistakable shrug of her exquisitely moulded shoulders.

"Is it true that you are going to that hot-bed of fever, South America, Dr. Vanner?" she asked in a low dragging voice which always entered his dreams, and haunted his waking hours. "It is the latest rumour," she added, with another eloquent gesture of contempt, "with which my brilliant knightly train has been seeking to amuse me."

"I hope they have succeeded," scornfully returned Max, a flash of wrath in his masterful eyes. How cold and cruel her flexible voice jarred upon his senses! "To amuse Miss Armyn would be a more difficult feat, and praiseworthy, perhaps, than to exterminate Yellow Jack for ever."

A crimson stain mounted to the pure Grecian brow, swept down the lovely face, and died under the jewelled bodice of her white silk gown.

"You should have been a surgeon," she said coldly. "You would have had no nice scruples about inflicting torture"

"Torture?" he whispered hoarsely, his warm breath fanning her lovely cheeks.

They had drawn apart from the pushing crowd, or the pushing crowd had drawn apart from them; neither, in this intense moment, noted which or cared.

"Torture? How little you comprehend what it is!"

Visibly she shrank from the fire in his eyes, the passion in his voice. Her action brought him to his senses.

He laughed lightly.

"Well, you have had your pound of flesh," he said. "And had it from the heart. Are you satisfied?"

She flashed him a disdainful glance from her great luminous eyes. They expressed a strange commingling of emotions.

"Do you blame me?" she asked bitterly. "You boasted of your strength. You were so proud, so cynical, so self-sufficient, and I was a woman, a coquette, what you will!"

She paused, then resumed with a little reckless laugh.

"What a great pity I could not escape my own flail when it fell!"

She had spoken almost fiercely; yet she turned with a smile on her exquisite face when a tall, pompous, middle-aged man walked in between them, placing a hand upon the arm of each.

So, in actual life, he stood between them.

"Is this thing I hear true, Vanner?" he asked. "Are you really so rash as to fling away your life in that pestilential city of Rio?"

"More valuable lives by far are flung away every day in the case of humanity, Charring," returned Max quietly.

He could not help but notice how deathly white Maud Armyn's lovely face had grown.

A great pity smote his heart, and bore away its bitterness.

He would not seek to see her again. After all, had she been to blame? If they had only met before she had sold herself to Mammon, personified in Paul Charring—if her training had been different from the worldly thing it was!

"Was going to ask you to be best man at my wedding," Charring's voice was saying, when Vanner again comprehended.

"If anything could tempt me to stay," retorted the physician, infinite scorn in his eyes, his firm lips smiling, "that would certainly be effective. But I wish you just as much joy of that occasion nevertheless. Now I must bid you both farewell. I leave London soon."

He shook hands with each, quite as if it were the most indifferent thing on earth; then sauntered down the long brilliant rooms, and disappeared from Maud Armyn's burning eyes.

"Are you ill, my dear?" exclaimed her betrothed, as a low moan passed the lovely lips.

"By Jove! Water, Ware; she has fainted! This infernal heat has overcome her."

But, whether due to the heat or a deeper-seated cause, next day Maud Armyn was down with brain fever.

Her wedding—that anticipated event of the season—was postponed, while, in her darkened room, the beautiful girl fought with a grim and grasping monster the battle of life and death.

People came and went with solicitous inquiries. Charring haunted the Armyn mansion like some giant ghost out of its element.

The doctors gave up all hope, and sat down to await the issue: then suddenly the tide was turned, and they knew that Maud Armyn would live.

During her convalescence, she was given a newspaper by her own request.

Her heart was hungering for news of the fevered Rio, where Max Vanner toiled above those writhing victims of a fell disease.

Suddenly her eyes fell upon the list of dead. They ran along the column; then with a wild cry she rose and staggered forward and fell in a shapeless heap, for Dr. Vanner's name was amongst them.

There was a long relapse, more dangerous—far more dangerous—than the first had been.

Although she had prayed to die, Maud recovered from it, however—but recovered and came back to earth so sad, so shadowy, so hopeless, that it brought tears to one's eyes to gaze upon her.

Digitized by Google

She sent for Paul Charring and told him the truth, blaming herself as he, in his manhood, never could have blamed her.

He would have comforted her in her wild, hopeless anguish, if he could. But he could not, so, regretfully, he freed her from her galling chains, and sailed for Australia.

Then society knew the engagement was off. Miss Armyn had thrown over a prince of finance. Was the girl mad? Or what had come between them?

"I shall never marry now," mused the girl wearily. "Never. Oh, my love, my king! why did I let you go? Why did I let you go?"

Then calming herself after a violent burst of grief, she would press her frail, white hands against her burning brow, and——

"I must go away—away, or I shall go mad!" she would murmur. "The world—Oh, I could not bear it. If only—only I could hope it would be over for me, too, soon!"

* * * * *

The narrow cots are pitifully full of writhing, suffering victims to that awful scourge—the Yellow Jack.

The nurses and physicians attending them here and there are pitifully few. So many are scattered throughout the city, stricken at its core.

"I wish you would look after the new nurse in the fourth ward," said one of the noble physicians to his doctor who came to relieve him. "She does not seem familiar with hospital work. Indeed, I should say she had never been familiar with any kind of work; but she was so eager they gave her the lightest cases."

The other bowed and went his way—a grave, brave, thoughtful way, treading down the thorns which lay so much thicker than roses in his path.

He attended all urgent cases, then, utterly unconscious that the windlass of fate was unravelling his destiny, silently entered the fourth ward.

A slim form, clad in grey, was bent over one of the cots.

Tears were streaming down her cheeks, for, with his childish hands in hers, its occupant had just passed away.

She looked up as the physician came forward and stood on the opposite side of the cot.

Their eyes met and he recoiled. She fell upon her knees with a low whisper.

He lifted her quickly in his arms and bore her from the infected room. He bore her beyond it, and out into the damp and drizzling air.

No word was spoken between them until they stood in the cool, deep vestibule of a silent churchyard. Then:

"Great Heaven! What are you doing in this infernal place?" panted Vanner, for he, indeed, it was. "Where is Charring? Is he mad, to bring you here?"

"I—I came myself. He does not know. We have parted for ever," stammered the beautiful nurse spasmodically.

Her eyes were bathed in happy tears; her heart, despite the danger and misery, dancing with bliss.

There followed momentary silence, then:

"And you—you have come to me, Maud?"

This was not the time for dissembling. Gladly she placed her hands in his outstretched palms, explaining to him the cause of her presence there.

"My noble darling," he whispered, drawing her close to his breast, "it was an error in the report. I remember noticing it, and smiling grimly to think it was chronicled on your wedding-day. Heavens! And to think there is nothing between us now, sweetheart. But I must take you from here at once—at once. I could not bear to lose you, now that you have been mine a moment."

Their lips met in a long, passionate kiss, from which plague, nor pestilence, nor death itself could ever take the tenderness; and in the cool, dark house of God they were joined that day, to work side by side through the weals and woes of all life's fevers for ever.

As she refused to leave Rio without her husband, they remained in the field of affliction, nobly striving for humanity's sake, until the fiend of destruction shrunk out of sight at winter's venomed touch.

Lally O'Brien.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 11 distribution must reach us by December 19th, addressed to The 11th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Eighth Distribution appears on page 789.

Digitized by Google

A POINT OF HONOUR.

"EVERYTHING'S settled," said Clavignac cheerfully, entering the café where Fougeret, surrounded by the usual group of journalists and professional men who frequented the place, awaited his return, "pistols, twenty paces, firing to go on till a result is reached."

"Good!" said Fougeret calmly, "and the rendezvous?"

"Vezinet race-course, 10 a.m. Then on to Asnieres. Order me a carriage for eight o'clock, and be sure to have the same driver. He'll bring us luck."

"As you say."

"And do not forget the doctor. The pistols I'll attend to; I have a brand new set, and it's a fine chance to try them."

"I leave all to you."

And with a warm hand-clasp to Clavignac, Fourgeret turned, nodded a hasty adieu to the rest of his friends, and left the room.

"A cool head, that Fougeret," admiringly remarked the sporting editor of a morning daily.

"Infernal cool!" came in a chorus from the group of men left behind, as if, in some way, their comrade's courage reflected credit upon them.

"He ought to be cool too," declared Clavignac, pouring himself out a full glass of absinthe. "Fougeret is not a chicken at this business; his fourth affair, if I count aright."

"So it is," responded the journalist respectfully.

"He shall head the line in my forthcoming series of the noted duellists of Paris."

Meanwhile Fougeret had passed into the street.

At the door of the café he had paused a moment as if to reflect; then, with a decided gesture, he started down the boulevard at a rapid gait.

Presently he halted before the window of a big book store filled with placards and gaily-bound volumes.

Prominently displayed in the front row were a dozen or so dainty little pamphlets neatly stamped on the back:

CONTES ROSES
ARMAND FOUGERET
THIRD EDITION.

He opened the door, entered, and passing between the long files of book-laden cases demanded of a clerk:

"M. Lavine—is he in?"

"In the office alone, sir."

Fougeret turned to the right and tapped at the door.

"Come in," responded a voice beyond.

Fougeret obeyed. The publisher, a man as young as himself nearly, with blonde beard and lively eyes, met him cheerfully.

"Come in, come in," said he, "glad to see you, too; 'Contes Roses' going splend dly. You saw them in the window. Third edition already. But what can I do for you to-day?"

"Can't you guess?" replied Fougeret, smiling in return.

"Money? The dickens!" cried the publisher, his brow clouding visibly; "always money. You have already drawn in advance, it seems to me."

"True, but I go out to-morrow, and it is necessary——"

"A duel!" broke in the other, "with Saint Landry, of course, for his article on 'Contes Roses.' You are right, my friend, entirely right. The critique was in bad taste and has affected our sales. Now, a duel as an offset will be an excellent advertisement, and, better still, will cost us nothing. Every paper in Paris will have the affair in full, and in giving the cause of the quarrel will speak of the book. A capital, admirable idea. Ten louis be enough?"

"Amply sufficient."

"There they are, then," said the publisher, piling ten pieces of gold before the author, while the clerk drew up a receipt.

"A thousand thanks," Fougeret answered, as he gathered up the money.

"Not at all, not at all," said the other, carefully shutting the receipt in his desk. "Always ready to oblige you. I count on seeing you at the Varieties to-morrow night."

Fougeret took the hand extended to him and went out.

It was not five o'clock, and Fougeret took his way to the Madeline, briskly keeping step to a lively opera air that he whistled between his teeth, till he reached the throng of public vehicles that crowd the streets of that quarter.

Bearing in mind his friend's injunction touching the choice of a driver, he hunted up the wheeled mascot.

instructed him to call for Clavignac at eight sharp the next morning, and then turned his step towards the Saint Lazare station.

These preparatory details did not seem to disturb him at all; he knew them all. Every affair was the same, and as he walked along he ran over in his mind the duels that he had already been engaged in. The first was seven years back, at Savigny-sur-Orze, where he made his journalistic début on a local paper. A follower of the Noirville candidacy he found himself arrayed in fierce opposition to the Legitimist organ in a controversy that wound up in the field. He was wounded, but Noirville was elected by a large majority.

The second occured from a Bourse transaction, where he figured as Noirville's secretary, a connection that involved him in a dispute with a jealous colleague, who sought a quarrel and found a sword thrust. The third was not very long after the second, and close on his heels came the ruin of his patron, Noirville whose speculations terminated in a sudden collapse. With the great banker's fall went all the secretary's prospects, and Fougeret's little savings were almost swallowed up in the general whirlpool.

Despondent at first, Fougeret rallied quickly and sturdily set to work to recover lost ground. He had others to think of besides himself—his brave little wife, whom he had married in days of prosperity, and who had clung to him closer than ever in the hour of misfortune. The thought of her and his two little children stimulated his efforts and strengthened him in the struggle for existence.

Through his connection with Noirville, Fougeret knew a number of journalists, and through the kindness of one of them the doors of the Review were open to the young writer, whose contributions were received with marked approval by the literary world. His first novel achieved a brilliant success, and the comedy taken from it met an enthusiastic reception on its first performance at the Odeon.

From that time on his success was assured, and he, in consequence, began to acquire enemies. The present collection of some of his articles into a volume entitled "Contes Roses" had drawn from the pen of the cavilling St. Landry a critique so scathing, bitter, and unjust that Fougeret, acting on his friends' advice, had sent his seconds to his jealous colleague.

And to-morrow he would be on the field as calm and careless as ever. What greater satisfaction could be given him, thought Fougeret, as he halted before his modest house and turned the key in the door.

"At last, Armand," said a soft voice coming from the kitchen; "I am so glad. Wait in the dining-room; dinner is ready."

He entered the room. The table was set with four plates, and looked so tempting and inviting that the young man gave a contented sigh. Then the door of the kitchen opened, revealing a dainty little woman, a trifle pale, with very blue eyes and very blonde hair, bearing a smoking tureen, followed by a four-year old baby, who solemnly brought up the rear with the ladle.

"But how is this?" Armand inquired, seating himself and unrolling his napkin, after tenderly kissing his wife and children, "you are waiting on the table? Where is Rose?"

"Rose," replied the little woman, with a shade of embarrassment, "Rose is gone. I sent her away."

"Sent her away?" said Armand, surprised. "And why?"

"She was dishonest," responded Claudine. "I could not keep her. I paid her a week in advance and dismissed her. You owe your dinner to Georget and me."

"Yes," said Georget gravely, "it was us. Don't you like the soup, papa?"

"Delicious!" declared Armand; "you are famous cooks. But—" dropping his voice a little, "where did you get the money, Claudine, to pay her?"

"I used what you gave me for the house this week. I knew that since your new book was nearly completed you could go to your publisher to-morrow morning and ask for an advance."

Armand trembled.

"So you see" continued his wife, "we can get along nicely. I would rather wait, of course, till the novel is finished, but I do not think that I am strong enough to go without eating until then. I have the will, but not the power, you know."

"And the money you shall have," broke in Armand hastily; "you will tire yourself out. I will have it—I will take it—two, or even three hundred francs if you desire."

"That will be better," Claudine assented, with a charming air of content, "because then I shall not have to part with my little piano. I did not intend you to know, but I found it a superfluous article of luxury, and they were coming to-morrow to take it away. Three hundred francs will get a nurse for the little one and many needed things besides."

"I see," said Armand, with a sad smile, "that the money will not last long."

"But in three weeks' time your book will be finished and we shall be rich again. Then I can have a new dress. This has been made over so many times, that there is scarcely enough left to hold the threads together."

"Yes," replied Armand, gazing consciously at the little threadbare gown, "I know—I know."

"And you need some new clothes, too, dear; and a new dress for Georget. Why, we will spend at least fifteen hundred francs."

"Fifteen hundred francs," repeated Armand thoughtfully.

"Fully fifteen hundred. A tremendous sum for us at present, dear, but your novel will bring us at least three thousand, and to think that twenty days will see it finished!"

"Twenty days," echoed Armand, speaking like an automaton.

"Ah, how happy we shall be!" Claudine went on, her eyes sparkling at the prospect of the pleasure she saw in advance. "We can pass the summer at the seaside; Georget can have a little red cap, and we'll all enjoy ourselves as we did four years ago, when we were rich. How it all comes back to me, and with it all the other pleasures that I owe you. Kiss me, dearest!" and the loving little woman threw her arms about her husband's neck, who embraced her tenderly.

Digitized by Google

"But really," said Claudine, when she had disengaged herself from Armand's arms, "it is nine o'clock already. I must put baby to bed, lock up the house, and see you settled at work before I go. Come!"

And taking the lamp she preceded her husband into the little library that adjoined the bedroom.

"There," said she, raising her lips for a parting kiss, "now work fast, get through it and remember that our happiness depends upon these pages."

Left a one Armand seized the pen, but found it impossible to write a single word. Other thoughts which refused to be banished, occupied his mind. His head on his hand and staring vacantly into space, he remained in one position two long hours.

Presently a light tap sounded on the door.

"Armand," murmured the sweet voice, "I'm going to bed. Baby's asleep and everything's locked up safe and secure. Don't work too late—you should not weary yourself, dear."

The words recalled him to himself. He looked at the paper. It was blank.

"Come," muttered he, "this won't do. I must get to work!" and resolutely beginning he wrote on and on with feverish haste, filling five or six pages without raising his head. Suddenly he stopped. He had just written the words placed by himself in the mouth of one of his characters: "So be it! if a duel your are seeking a duel you shall have."

"A duel!" he cried, "why I am going to fight a duel myself!"

And a vision of the morrow passed swiftly before his eyes—the open clearing, the group of seconds, two men dressed in black facing each other, pistols pointing at the grass awaiting the signal, while the sunbeams shone through the trees and the birds sang joyously.

But the scene changed suddenly. It was a man he saw now, pale, and with closed eyes, lying on a litter, while one of the carriers stood knocking at a door—his door, as he recognised instantly. The woman who ran to meet the mournful cortège—the trembling creature who, with a terrible cry, threw herself upon the body—he recognised her, too. It was Claudine!

Armand rose hastily and rapidly paced the room. The thing was true. To-morrow he was to fight. To-morrow, pistol in hand he would be risking his own life to take another's.

His life! Great Heaven! did it belong to him? Had he the right to dispose of it? Did he not owe it as much as he owed money, to those that depended on him? Were he dead, what would become of the wife and the children thrown helplessly on the mercy of his terrible creditors? He had no means. There wasn't as much as a hundred franc note in the house. His sole dependence was his pen, his brain, and his talent. Where would they be to-morrow?

And his little wife, so frail and delicate, what was in store for her? The hospital. And after that? His children too: Georget, so bright, so happy, so intelligent; his little girl, his merry darling, what would become of her?

Fougeret continued to nervously pace up and down. The veins in his temples throbbed to bursting. He wetted a towel and bound it about his head. The cold water helped to cool his burning brain. Now he saw it all clearer. He had exaggerated the situation. A duel was not necessarily fatal. Had he not fought three already, and was not he still alive on the verge of the fourth?

Yes, but then he was alone in the world. His life was his own; he had a right to dispose of it as he pleased. He had no wife to leave behind, no children to leave fatherless, penniless and helpless. And as these thoughts began again to whirl through his brain, he fancied that he could see the shining barrel of the pistol with the little round dark hole aimed directly between his eyes.

He tried to shake off the presentiment, to think of other things. It refused to vanish. He was responsible for those he loved. They lived through him, and they would perish without him. The ball that struck him would take more than one life. There would be three victims, three to whom he owed love, happiness, and bread. Great Heaven! How terrible it all was!

But another thought, equally cruel, tortured his soul—his honour.

He knew his comrades and the scoffing strollers of the boulevards. He heard their comments and their pitiless mockery. What were they saying? "A coward?" No! Impossible! Some of his comrades would surely defend him. Men were good at heart. Some would be found that could understand.

"Armand," cried an anxious voice from an adjoining room, "is anything the matter, dear? You have been talking to yourself so loud, so strangely, for more than an hour. Are you ill, dear?"

"No, no, little one," returned Armand with a smile. Then, as the lids fell heavily over the sleepy eyes she added drowsily:

"Just think, Armand, what would become of us—if you—were to—be—ill—the babies and me. Good-night, dear."

And the loving wife resumed her dream.

At the other end of the room, tucked in her little crib, smiling and peaceful, her little hands clasped across her bosom, little Georget slept tranquilly.

A sudden storm of tears wet Armand's cheeks. He rushed to his desk, caught up a sheet of paper and wrote furiously.

At half past ten next morning a man, irreproachably clad in black, stood on the Vezinet field holding out a letter with agitated air to another individual, equally anxious and no less solemn.

"Is it possible?" cried the first.

"Simply incredible!" responded the second.

"He forgets himself and reflects upon us."

And with a grave air the two men advanced towards the opposing group, who were viewing these proceedings with a puzzled air.

"Messieurs," said one of the two, speaking clearly in the midst of a general silence; "we regret to announce that our principal and former friend, M. Armand Fougeret, will not be on the field to-day. He declines to fight. It is needless to add," continued he, replacing the hat on his head with a sweeping gesture, "that we are entirely at your service—in M. Fougeret's place."

Ronald Maclean.

Digitized by Google

"Sandy Carmichael,"

BY

CUTCLIFFE HYNE,

- - - - Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," etc., etc. - - - -

THIS GRAND ROMANCE STARTS NEXT WEEK IN

"SHORT STORIES."

READ THE TABLE OF CONTENTS:

Book i.

CONCERNING THE FLIGHT FROM CULLODEN MOOR.

How two Englishmen came to Lochaber: and how they stole and ate black-faced mutton.

How two fugitives kept house in Lochaber: how Murtagh O'Neill appeared and was received: how the household was again reduced to two: and how these two were evicted by a troop of heavy cavalry.

How the five dragoons were outwitted: how Murtagh O'Neill provided doe-vension: how the two reconnoitred: how the flood-tide flows in St. Peter's Strait: and how a trading cutter was requisitioned without the usual formalities.

How the boy came out of the forepeak: how he volunteered to pilot: and how the cruise to France was planned.

How the cutter was victualled: how a compass was procured from the snow Anne of Waterford: and how the moonlight failed off Bristol Channel.

Book ii.

CONCERNING THE VOYAGE IN THE SOUTH SEA.

How his Excellency the Governor of Lima was bearded by deputy: how he sent out the Sta. Thérea to work his vengeance: and how that same vengeance recoiled on his Excellency's own head.

How the snow Fortune's Favourite, of Bristol, proved to be laden with more firearms than a simple trader generally carries: how she cruised on the Spanish Main: and how she manned and dispatched a prize in search of fresh adventures and reward.

How it was decided to turn for home: how the ambergris was seen: how the black squall came down; how the jolly boat rode it out: and how she fared afterwards.

How the canoes sailed down from the North: how a sail was spied: and how three white men were rescued.

Book iii.

CONCERNING THE RULE OF KING OLERON.

How the three became convalescent: how they distrusted the chief sorcerer: and how they discussed their future prospects.

How King Oleron held a state reception: how the three principal visitors were invited to sorcery and luncheon: and how they criticised their host and his clan.

How three Europeans built a villa residence, replete with many modern conveniences; and how they re-invented things they had been familiar with all their lives through.

How Erman sorcery failed to make water run uphill: how Murtagh O'Neill solved a simple problem in hydrostatics: how matrimony was suggested; and how a festival was interrupted by the ominous arrival of Dajian emissaries.

How Murtagh O'Neill essayed the rôle of Theseus: how war was decided on: and how the Ermans refused to learn a "complete art of war" other than their own.

How the Dajian canoes landed on Erma: how a great battle was fought: and how Sandy Carmichael discouraged anthropophagy.

How the Ledge was turned into a fort: how it was defended: how three of the besieged got out: and how they came across the chief sorcerer to the Island of Erma.

How the three Europeans refreshed themselves: how the chief sorcerer turned traitor: and how Sneyd and O'Neill got a respite from the oven just in the nick of time.

Book iv.

CONCERNING A SOJOURN AMONGST THE DAJIANS.

How Sneyd and O'Neill landed on Daji: how they were imprisoned in a prehistoric temple: how they tried to break gaol: how they met with an impediment: and how they had an unexpected lady visitor.

How the Dajians foolishly arrived before their appointed time: how Norah wisely and pluckily did the same: how she and the two white men climbed the giant stairs: how they supped off baked eggs: and how Sneyd and O'Neill made a solemn compact.

How the storming party was repulsed: how the retreat was continued to the mountain tops: how a raid was made for food: and how the Chief Sorcerer came to a bad end.

How Sneyd and O'Neill decided to annex Ebry's quarters: how they returned to the mountain camp, and learnt of Norah's abduction: and how they schemed future plans.

How Sneyd and O'Neill followed up Norah and her captors little by little: how they arrived in the nick of time at a certain hut: how the Dajians tried to roast them out: and how they walked through the flames unscathed.

Books v. & vi.

How Sandy Carmichael stirred up the Ermans: how he led them to victory: how the Dajian canoes went away: and how the Ermans did homage to their King Alexander.

How Sneyd and O'Neill vowed allegiance to King Alexander: how Norah was made Mrs. O'Neill: how a plan was schemed for the defence of the island: and how the same was carried into effect.

How the brig Eliza Williams rescued two starving men from a canoe out at sea: how these two men were pressed on board H.B.M.S. Serpent, and met an old acquaintance in her captain: and how Sandy Carmichael, alias King Alexander, proved to be Henry Weldon Vivian, Esquire.

Digitized by Google

THE PURSE WITH THE RUBBER BAND.

CHIEF CONSTABLE PARKER'S term of office in an Australian town was drawing rapidly to a close. Although crime had been rampant during his reign, not one arrest of importance had been made. Of course, he would not be re-elected unless he redeemed himself.

"Rat-tat-tat."

"Come in," cried the chief.

The door opened slowly and a tall man, with a tall silk hat in his hand, entered. The hat showed frequent ironing, and his long coat was shiny at the seams. Even his shirt was limp, and his face unshaved.

"I see the chief, I presume?" spoke the stranger, in oily, inquiring tones.

"I am the chief."

"I suppose, sir, that you have a clerk within hearing here, so that no important information which comes to your ears may lack corroboration?"

"Well, ah, no. I've thought of that, but have been too busy to look after it. What is your desire?"

The stranger's eyes twinkled with satisfaction as he answered:

"My name, sir, is Paul Tracy. I am the manager of Tracy's Opera Company, which, for reasons financial, has been compelled to disband in your town. Now, suppose, my dear sir, that I should come to you and tell you that I had been robbed—that my purse containing thirty-one pounds four shillings and sevenpence had been taken from me by a highwayman, what would you do?"

"I would endeavour to recover the money and catch the thief."

"You would fail."

"Perhaps I should."

"Of course you would," responded Tracy; "of course you would, and then good-bye to your re-election, for I should make my loss public. Now, let me ask you how much this post is worth to you?"

"My salary is four hundred and fifty pounds a year."

"And how much can you earn if you lose it?"

"About three pounds a week, I should fancy."

"Exactly. One hundred and fifty pounds a year. This job, then, is worth three hundred pounds a year more than outside employment would be, and, besides, it is more congenial. Now, I'll let you have it for one more term if you recover my purse with thirty-one pounds four shillings and sevenpence in it."

"What!" exclaimed Chief Parker. "How can you let me have another term? You are not even one voter, much less a majority."

"I suppose you know the value of advertising?"

"Yes."

"I come to your office to-morrow morning with a couple of reporters. I have told them my loss, and it has been printed in the morning papers with a fling at yourself. Of course they are assured of your failure, and I am condoled with on the way. We enter here. You invite us to be seated, and you go to your desk and unlock it. You produce a worn purse with a rubber band round it, and ask me if it is mine. I say 'yes.' You tell me to open it and count the contents. I find them correct—thirty-one pounds four shillings and sevenpence. Why, man, it will be like a chapter out of a French detective story. The newspaper fellows are amazed at your success, and the journals cover you with glory. The public reverses its decision, and you have a walk over. Do you agree?"

"But I don't think I can recover your purse."

"Great Scott, man! Can't you raise thirty-one pounds four shillings and sevenpence?"

"Why, yes. You mean——"

"There are plenty of old purses in the second-hand shops, and I see a couple of rubber bands on your desk."

"You mean that I shall make believe I recover your money?"

"Precisely."

"And, in fact, it must come out of my pocket?"

"That's it. You've got it at last."

"Well, I'll do it."

"Thank you. I'll wait on you then, to-morrow morning about eleven. Until then, good-bye."

* * * * *

"Good-morning, Mr. Tracy. How are you, gentlemen? Please be seated."

As Mr. Tracy and the two reporters sat down they became conscious of another person in the room. A small, sharp-eyed man advanced from the window.

Digitized by Google

"I have the honour of presenting you to Mr. Hawkins. He is a member of our detective force, and will have a slight connection with this case. Mr. Tracy, I will ask you to describe your lost property, if you will."

"A worn leather purse held by a rubber band."

"And the contents?"

"Thirty-one pounds in gold, four shillings in silver, and seven pennies."

"Where did you get this money?"

"Why, I got it at the bank," replied Tracy slightly disconcerted.

"May I ask what bank?"

"The Victoria National."

"Have you got that, Mr. Hawkins?" asked the chief, turning towards the detective.

"I have," answered that person.

The chief stepped to his safe, and, unlocking it, took therefrom an old purse.

"Is this yours?" he said to Tracy.

"Yes," answered the ex-manager eagerly.

"Examine it, and see that the contents are all correct."

Tracy poured out the glittering coins on a table and counted them. Everything correct, even to the pennies.

"Are you sure, Mr. Tracy, that those are the same coins that you drew from the bank?"

"Quite sure. Here's a nick in one that I made with a penknife. I remember the dates also, for I always look at the dates on money."

"Is there no possibility, Mr. Tracy, that your money may have been changed by someone?" put in Hawkins.

"None whatever, sir. Why, I could swear to these coins in a court of law."

"Gentlemen," said the chief to the reporters, "will you be kind enough to take a look at that money?"

They did so.

"Mr. Parker," cried Tracy, in an irritated tone, "I came here to receive my property. If you have done with me, I will take it and go."

"I have done with you, sir; but I think Mr. Hawkins has not."

"What do you want with me?" Tracy angrily asked the detective.

"Your company to the gaol. Those coins are counterfeit. Hold out your hands, please."

Tracy was sold. He had drawn the web round himself. The cashier of the Victoria National Bank swore positively that he had never received any money from him.

Chief Constable Parker was re-elected by an overwhelming majority. CHAS. SLADE.

CURED OF LOVE-SICKNESS.

AT a meeting of the Medical Society, early in May, I read a report of some work that I had been doing with an improved stethoscope devised by the celebrated Hofhauer of Vienna, and threw in some remarks upon the theory of Nordau and others, that love is a disease, claiming that I had detected it in several hearts, and in one had succeeded in accomplishing a complete cure.

There was one listener to whom my words went straight as a message from Olympus. He called upon me somewhat more than a month after the date of that meeting.

He was a tall young fellow, of a very graceful figure. He had a well-shaped head, crowned with wavy yellow hair, strikingly contrasting with his dark, well-marked eyebrows and hazel eyes. He was extremely nervous, and his bearing suggested that of one who has just begun to suspect the presence of serious organic disorder.

"You have my card, doctor," said he. "I am Arthur Langford, son of Doctor Langford."

I replied that I was flattered he had consulted me instead of his distinguished father.

"I couldn't go to father about this," he said; and then added, with a nervous laugh: "I came to you as an expert."

"What seems to be the trouble?" I inquired.

He hesitated a moment, and then said:

"You remember the essay that you read before the Medical Society in May? Well, I was there with my father. That was after his accident, you know. I heard what you said about—about love. I have been thinking of it ever since, and I have come to ask you if it is true that love can be cured, like any other disease."

I was painfully in doubt as to the proper course to pursue. I might have told him the exact truth, and have sent him away without help or comfort, or it was open to me to hear his story, and do my best.

"What are the symptoms in this case?" I asked at last.

"They are very serious," he said. "You mus'n't think that I am altogether a fool. I haven't come on a mere boyish notion, but because I can't live much longer unless something is done for me. This woman that I love is not the most beautiful in the world—I wouldn't claim that. She is well born, and in every way high and noble. Yet it isn't that. It's because she is just herself, and there is no one else in the least like her."

His face was flushed, and his eyes shone wonderfully bright. Suddenly the colour vanished from his cheeks, and the light from his eyes.

Digitized by Google

"She loves somebody else. I might as well tell you who it is; she loves Bertram, the artist—Walter Bertram. He's done something in the world, and that's more than I can claim, but he's nearly forty; and he's beginning to look it."

"I know him slightly," said I. "Are they engaged?"

"It isn't announced, but it's easy enough to see how matters stand."

"I thought she was away this spring," said I.

"What! You know who she is?" he exclaimed.

"I can't help thinking that you mean Miss Wilmot," was my answer; and he bowed his head reverently at the mention of the name.

"She got back to town on the the first of June," said he, after a pause; "and it began again, at once. Neither I nor any other fellow can get a chance to say two words to her. There doesn't seem to be any opposition from her people, and everybody expects the announcement of their engagement, and a wedding in the autumn."

"Which brings me back to the symptoms," said I.

He paused in his restless pacing of the floor, and gripped the back of a heavy chair with his long and delicately slender fingers.

"In the first place," said he, "I am dying for sleep. I think that in three weeks I have not slept half-an-hour at a time. When I lie down, I toss about for awhile; then fall asleep, and instantly wake up. I start up as if at a blow; it is the thought of her. A million times in a night I do this, and in the morning I am utterly exhausted. They say the Chinese have a torture like that, and it kills the victim in a little while. Then I can't eat. My father has noticed that, and he is worried about it. He has given me some medicine for it," and he laughed bitterly.

"You should see me try to work," he continued. "I simply cannot do it. I ought to tell you that I am an architect—only beginning, of course—but I have a fine chance, and everyone says I have unusual ability."

"Have you lost much in weight?" I asked.

"All I can," he said. "Look here."

He threw his coat upon the floor, and bared his arm. The muscles were startlingly defined. I passed my hands over his body, and made up my mind that he had lost all he could. Without considering fanciful theories, here was a love that was strictly pathological.

"I am beginning to notice a very annoying headache," said he. "It is right between my eyes, and it feels as if my head were being pressed together. There's a pain just under my heart, too, that's pretty bad at times."

"A nervous contraction," said I. "You'll be full of such pains if this thing does not stop. Can't you give up thought of her?"

"Not without your help."

"And are you sure that you want to?"

"Of course. Why am I here?"

"Very well," said I. "We will cure you and at once. But mind all this! All the responsibility is on you. Do not blame me afterwards."

If I had not been perfectly sure of the result, I should not have ventured on such a piece of charlantry; but it seemed necessary to clear his mind of the fanciful notions, under the influence of which he had been led to ask a magical cure from me. Once set him right in that matter, and he might be saved by proper means from the complete nervous collapse with which he was immediately threatened.

I mixed a dose of bromide of soda in a green goblet of very impressive appearance.

"Drink this," said I, "and you will cease to love her. Go on as you are going, and you will endure these tortures that you describe, and others that are worse. You will wreck your career, disappoint your parents, and gain absolutely nothing, so far as I can see."

He took the goblet in his hands, he raised it to his lips, then suddenly dashed it down.

"Utterly hopeless! Utterly hopeless!" he cried. "Yet I would rather love her and die!"

He sank into a chair and sobbed.

"Just as I supposed," said I. "You don't want to be cured. Nobody does. A doctor who made a speciality of that wouldn't earn his rent. Since you don't want to get rid of it, let's build you up so that you can more thoroughly enjoy it."

"Enjoy it?" he groaned.

"Well, endure it, then, if you like the word better. Will you take the treatment that I will give you for a couple of weeks merely for the sake of the experiment and to satisfy me?"

After some difficulty I got him to promise, and for about the period named he was under my care. I succeeded in making him sleep, and inducing him to eat three meals a day, and he began to look and to feel a good deal better. One day he burst into my office, the picture of health and happiness.

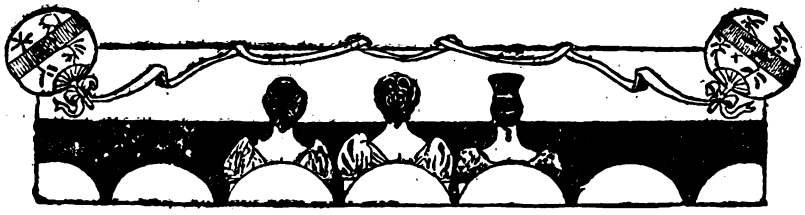
"Doctor!" he cried, "I am cured. I've found the remedy for all the pangs of love. It's love cures love. It's love returned that has cured me. Doctor, she's mine!"

"Thank heaven!" I said fervently. "When did this happen?"

"Last evening," he replied, "I was at her house, and somehow I got the courage to say what was in my heart; and now it's all right. But suppose—suppose for just one instant that I had taken your cure and had lost this!"

"I don't care to think of it," said I; "it's a dangerous subject for a doctor to meddle with. I think I'll let it alone."

Howard Fielding.



Digitized by Google

A CRY FOR HELP.

MANY of the occurrences which are now regarded, even by learned men, as manifestations of the supernatural, are capable of easy explanation by natural sciences. That they remain mysteries is often due to the fact—as we have already found in some instances—that the explanation is so easy that it either does not occur to us that it can be the true one, or that we reject it as improbable just because it appears to be so much more simple than we expected.

A mystery of this kind, with which was connected a page of the life drama of three persons, occurred a few years ago in New South Wales.

Extending for thousands of feet below the surface, and connected by numerous tunnels and leads, is a mine of rich magnetic iron ore famous throughout the colony. It has been worked for many years in the past, and will probably continue its yield for very many more years in the future, but there is one vein of the richest ore which is not now touched. It is looked upon as haunted for the reason which I am about to set forth; and although the mystery has been cleared up, the superstition is as strong as ever.

One day, some few minutes before the hour for leaving work, a big Irishman was working with his heavy sledge-hammer at the extremity of the tunnel where this vein is situated. He had paused for a moment to rest from his work, when he was startled by the sound of a voice coming from the wall of shining ore in front of him. He looked round with a scared face, but the next instant he laughed at his fears, and picked up his tool to continue his work.

"Be jabers!" he muttered, "I'll tache thim to play tricks wid me."

But the heavy hammer which he had already raised for a blow fell from his hands, as, with a cry of horror, he started back. His face was blanched, his eyes glassy, and his hair seemed to be rising on end, as there came to his ears the clear sound of a voice on the other side of the wall, uttering a piteous appeal for help.

Tim O'Connor shook in every limb; he glared at the wall from which the sound proceeded. Then he heard it again:

"Help! Help! Oh, help!"

There was no mistaking the sound. It was the cry of some captive—someone entombed behind that wall. Tim had stood as though his feet were fixed to the spot, but at this last cry his fear gave him strength to move, and he fled down the tunnel toward the main shaft, uttering loud cries for assistance.

As it happened, the foreman and three or four men were descending; the cage was stopped, they stepped out, and the foreman hastily inquired what was wrong.

It was some seconds before Tim could give a sensible reply. At first he could only point in the direction he had quitted and mutter fragments of words, but at last he was able to reply in a coherent manner.

"It's all rubbish, Tim," said the foreman, "there can't be anybody at the back of that wall—how can there be? Some hing has scared you. Here, come along with us, and we'll show you that there's nothing to be afraid on."

Somewhat unwillingly, Tim accompanied the foreman and the other men to the extremity of the lead. The foreman looked about by the light of his lamp, and all the men listened for the cry that Tim had heard; but they neither saw nor heard anything to confirm his story.

"I told you there was nothing," said the foreman, rather angrily. "Have you had anything strong to drink while you've been down——?"

He stopped abruptly. He had been standing close to the wall as he uttered the last words, and he had heard a sound that cut short his remarks. The abrupt ending of his speech created intense excitement among the others; all listened, and they heard what appeared to be the end of a cry:

"Oh, hel—!"

The excitement of the men now rose to fever heat. Every one of them had heard it, and there could be no doubt that it came from somewhere at the back of that mass of shining ore. Some poor fellow was entombed; but how did he get there? So far as they knew, no other lead came within considerable distance of it, and the ocean was above and beyond it.

The foreman felt that he could do nothing on his own account, but must communicate what had occurred to the manager.

The manager could not refuse to believe the evidence of all the men that they had heard a cry for assistance; and although he considered the thing impossible, he gave orders for half a dozen men to work away at the wall within certain limits. Beyond those limits they dare not go; if they did, the water would enter and the mine would be flooded.

Willing hands attacked at the wall, but although the men—working that day and the next—penetrated as far as prudence permitted, there was no result. Yet that same evening the cry for help was heard again.

Digitized by Google

The affair created considerable stir, not only among the miners, but also among the people of the outside world. A rumour that that part of the mine was haunted quickly spread abroad. The men refused to work at that point, and curious people from outside visited Tunnel No. 6, in order to hear the ghostly cry. Among the latter were a well-to-do young Englishman and his sister, who had been living there for about a year, having inherited some property in the town.

Henry Chard was known among the residents as a dabbler in the occult sciences, and his sister was credited with the same liking for the mysterious. That they should desire to visit the mine and hear the cry was regarded as a matter of course, and the manager, who was on friendly terms with them, readily agreed to act as conductor.

"I can't promise you that you will hear it, Mr. Chard," said the manager. "Only two people, besides the miners, have heard it. Those who didn't hear it are disposed to think that they have been 'had.' The evening seems to be the best time; on each occasion it has been the evening when the cry has been heard. I confess that I haven't heard it myself, and am inclined to look upon it as an illusion."

The three descended in the cage, and made their way from the main shaft along the lead to the haunted vein.

"This is the spot," said the manager, as they arrived, "and this is just about the time when Tim O'Connor first heard the cry. You had better stand with your best ear quite close to the wall and keep silent."

It was a weird experience, and all three felt instinctively impressed by it. As the seconds went by, and they listened intently and expectantly, their nerves were strung up to the highest pitch. The manager forgot his anxiety concerning Miss Chard's powers of endurance in his own excitement. Would they hear anything? If so, what?

Suddenly, in the midst of the almost oppressive silence, there came in low but distinct tones:

"Help! Help! Oh, hel—!"

"There it is!" said the manager in a suppressed voice, which quivered with emotion, "did you hear it? Three call for help, just as O'Connor said! What can it mean?"

"Very strange," returned Chard. "It seemed as though the last word 'help' had been cut short. What do you think, Lucy?" he added, half turning to his sister. "What is the matter—are you ill? It has been too much for you."

She had clutched his arm, and he felt that she was trembling violently. He was about to put his arm round her to support her, but she pushed it aside.

"Listen!" she exclaimed, and her voice was strangely altered. "Listen carefully! The last word is not 'help.' Oh, Harry!"

Chard was moved and mystified by his sister's conduct, but all three listened for a repetition of the appeal.

"Help! Help! Oh, hel—! They will kill me here!"

There was an addition this time, and the words were followed by a noise which they likened to that of iron knocking against iron. Before either of the men could make any remark, Lucy uttered a scream and fell sobbing upon her brother's breast.

"Oh, Harry!" she sobbed. "It is Jack's voice! I recognised it distinctly."

"Come, come, my dear!" said Chard soothingly. "You are overwrought. This has been too much for you."

"Yes," added the manager sympathetically. "Let us be going from here. The place is haunted, sure enough."

"No, no!" returned Lucy Chard. "I tell you that it is the voice of our cousin, Jack Strong. I recognise the tone, and the last words is not 'Help,' but 'Hal,' and he is calling for you, Harry, to help him. Oh! stay and listen again!" she continued, releasing herself from her brother's embrace and wringing her hands. "Listen again, and you will see that I am right."

The manager shook his head incredulously, but all kept silence once more. After a few seconds they heard the appeal again. To the manager there was no difference in the sound of the third "help," but to Chard and his sister it was now plainly, "Oh, Hal!"

Without another word Chard turned to retrace his steps to the main shaft, drawing his sister gently with him; and it was not until they reached the surface either of the three spoke, and then it was only to say good-bye.

Chard was now inclined to his sister's opinion that the voice was that of their cousin calling upon him for assistance, yet it was so wildly improbable that he could not bring himself to believe that it was so. The last they had heard of him, he was travelling in Italy, that was three months ago, and although it was strange that they had not received any further letter from him, they did not apprehend any untoward occurrence. Had the voice come to them in their own room, they would not have been surprised; their belief in spiritualism prepared them for manifestations of that nature, but the fact that the voice was heard down a deep mine and in one particular spot, did not come within the range of their experience.

Yet both brother and sister were now certain that the words used were "Oh, Hal!" and not "Oh, help!" as the other hearers believed.

It was a strange fact that Henry Chard was called "Hal" by no one except his cousin and school-fellow, Jack Strong. The mystery was too deep for him to solve. Late into the night the brother and sister sat and discussed the matter from all possible standpoints without arriving at any key to the difficulty. They retired to bed, but neither slept till the early morning, when tired nature asserted her rights.

Day after day for nearly a week Henry and Lucy Chard visited the haunted vein. On the last occasion, Henry Chard told the manager when he reached the surface that he was going to leave the colony by the first steamer for England, where he would probably remain for some weeks. The next morning, Chard, in answer to the inquiries of the manager, whom he met near the mining company's office, explained the reason of his journey.

"My sister and my cousin are engaged, although, as in many other cases, there had been no formal declaration of the fact. Jack has business in England which he expected would keep him there for nearly two years after we left; then he was coming over here to settle with us.

"My sister is so convinced that she heard his voice in the mine that she will not rest unless either she or I undertake a journey to Europe and make a search for him. He was travelling when last she heard. If news is received from him after the steamer reaches England she will telegraph to me, and I am to keep her informed by wire of my whereabouts. If no news comes from this side my search will continue until I have found him or am convinced that he is dead."

"That seems somewhat quixotic, doesn't it?" asked the manager. "You can't be absolutely certain that you are correct——"

Digitized by Google

"In any case," returned Chard, "my sister's happiness depends upon finding out what has really become of Jack. If I do not undertake the search, she will; and I can hardly permit that. I want you, Sims, to look after my sister as much as convention will allow while I am away. She will want to visit the mine pretty frequently, I expect; sometimes you can dissuade her, but at others it will be cruel not to humour her. I must leave that to your discretion. We have been good friends during the past year, Sims, and I want you to help me so far as you can in this difficulty."

"You may rely upon me, Chard," returned Mr. Sims, "and on my side I will see what can be done to elucidate this mystery. I intend to get the company to call in some scientific men and see if we cannot get to the bottom of it. When do you start?"

"I leave home in three days," returned Chard, "in order to catch the first steamer."

"Well, I hope that by the time you set foot on shore at Southampton, you will receive a wire from your sister or from me that the mystery has been solved, and that in return we shall receive a message from you that you have found your cousin alive and well."

Henry Chard left for Europe, and in course of time scientific men were at work endeavouring to clear up the mystery. Lucy Chard paid frequent visits to the mine, in company with the manager; it was generally supposed that she went there from her love of the occult, and that her brother had been called back to England on business, for the real facts were kept secret partly out of consideration for Lucy's feelings.

Weeks passed, and several scientific men endeavoured in turn to find an explanation for the sound of a voice in the haunted vein. The appeal for help was heard at intervals, almost always near the hour when the miners left off work. The scientific men formed the cries based on various natural phenomena; they made elaborate calculations and measurements to satisfy themselves that the manager was right in saying that it was impossible to penetrate the wall much farther without flooding the mine; they racked their brains to obtain some clue to the puzzle, and one after another they were forced to give it up.

No news was received from Strong, and Chard's messages conveyed no certain intelligence; he was seeking his cousin in different parts of Europe. At the end of three months there came a message from Chard to the effect that he was afraid his cousin had become mixed up with some political complication in Russia, and that he was doing his best to trace him in that country.

Two weeks later there arrived at Sydney two learned gentlemen—an Englishmen and a German—who had come, with the latest scientific implements and theories, prepared to spend months in the mine with the view of solving the problem. They were devoted to science, and their expenses were to be paid by scientific bodies in their native countries.

These gentlemen set to work in real earnest. They made the usual calculations and measurements, they listened to the appealing voice, carefully arranged their sensitive seismic and other scientific instruments in position near the wall, and argued the matter from all points of view. Every law of magnetism and electricity, and transmission of sound, was called into requisition.

Their first theory was that the sound did not come from the back of the wall, but was transmitted from some other point of the mine. But it was not possible now to believe that some one was entombed in the mine; such a captive would long ago have died of starvation, so that theory had to be relinquished. Other theories were formed and abandoned in like manner.

Lucy Chard occasionally accompanied these gentlemen when they descended into the mine to make their experiments, and they caught some of her excitement; this, combined with their own devotion to science, made them more determined than ever to surmount the difficulty. The solution came unexpectedly.

One evening the two scientists had arranged a phonograph and microphone close to the wall, for on the last occasion there had been another sound too indistinct for them to catch. They all waited and listened intently. Presently there came sounds which at first could not be properly distinguished. They almost imagined that a conversation was being carried on, and Lucy's nerves were so strained that she was trembling in every limb. Then the conversation became distinct, and although they could not hear all, the three listeners stood transfixed with amazement at what they did hear. To Lucy it was more clear than to the other two.

She knew that her brother had discovered Jack imprisoned in a cell and had found means of releasing him. The words: "Thank Heaven, you have come to release me, Hal!" were distinctly audible to all three.

Lucy's explanation of her brother's search gave the scientific men the clue to the mystery, which was afterwards explained by one of them in the following words:

"This rich vein of magnetic iron ore is in reality a natural telephone, and has transmitted to us the cry of a prisoner confined where the natural conditions were similar. The vein has served the purpose of a perfect conductor. If Miss Chard's idea is correct, the sounds have been transmitted from Siberia, and it is a fact that to the north of the Ural Mountains, in the bleak Obdorsk region, there is a valuable mine of superior magnitits, where prisoners are confined. As these great veins of loadstone trend north and south, and as that part of Russia is almost due north of us, it is not improbable, however much so it may appear to the non-scientific person, that we have been listening to a conversation going on in that dismal region. As a familiar name has occurred in the conversation, we must believe that this explanation is the true one. If Mr. Strong has been released by Mr. Chard, we shall not have long to wait for a confirmation of my statement."

It proved that Strong, who was warm-hearted, but certainly had no head for the revolutionary business, had become mixed up in some political trouble, and sent to the very mine mentioned by the scientist. He was imprisoned after the day's work in a cell, and in the agony of his mind he had often called upon his cousin for assistance.

Chard had traced little by little, and, having succeeded in rendering a service to one in authority in Siberia, had been able to procure his cousin's release on the expressed stipulation that Strong should leave Europe.

Although the authorities had no power to enforce this stipulation, the cousins gladly agreed to it, and took steamer to New South Wales as soon as Jack had settled what remained of his business in England.

Jack and Lucy were married soon after the two men reached the colony; but, as the whole affair quickly leaked out, they removed to another part of the colony, where Lucy is endeavouring to make Jack and herself forget that terrible experience. M. WOODFORD.

Digitized by Google

SEVENTY-ONE
.. AND ..
SEVENTY-TWO.

They met at the Mont-de-Piété. This office of pledges and redemptions—this Parisian shrine of poverty and central altar of official usury—was crowded. A long line like a torpidly winding serpent stretched itself lazily far out into the Rue des Blancs-Manteaux. For several hours the clerk behind his grated window had droned out the numbers as he bent his worn face above the greasy book in which he is busy inscribing names and addresses.

"Again? So soon? And still pretty," with a vicious smile. "Lace pin—with small diamond—hum! Twenty francs for Seventy-one. Pass on quickly! Next! Well? And you? A carved crucifix. Ivory? No. Five francs for Seventy-two."

"No more?"

"No more. Take or leave. You detain the others. Decide."

Number Seventy-two hesitates. Suddenly a rough hand tugs at her shabby shawl. She turns. It is number Seventy-one. A moment later the two girls stand side by side in the street.

"Here. Take this," mutters Seventy-one. "I insist. I stole your luck by my odd number. Besides—it is to cheat the devil. No? Why? What a little fool!"

Seventy-two has a face of pale flame. Her lips are blue, and much shivering has rounded her thin shoulders. Seventy-one is read easily, a feminine gamin. She thrives on Paris as a dandelion flaunts from the crevice of paving stone. The one is smiling, yet dumb with amazement. The other talks, laughs, yet will never smile again.

"Tut! A few francs. What are they to me? and I shall redeem my pin to-morrow, while you"—a glance completed the sentence.

"And I—it was that I might celebrate Paul's fête day——"

"You live—"

"At No—an attic in the Rue Sainte Marguerite. He—Paul—works at the theatre. It is a good position, but it is necessary that he appear well to keep it. This eats his earnings as a moth eats feathers. We are from the South—Paul and I. He is happy here—but I—"

"Amuse yourself by starving that he may—oh! I understand. Here!"— and she draws her into a wine shop. "Waiter! A basket! Now fill it, pate—some of those. 'Tis I who shall supply Paul's feast. But on one condition my friend—that you eat half. And the wine is for you." Paying the waiter, Seventy-one drops the change into the loaded basket.

"And I who accept this—do not yet know your name." Seventy-two is grateful, but there are no tears. Tears are a luxury with the poor.

"Call me number Seventy-one."

"I shall call you—my saint."

"Anything but that, my girl. Well, Seventy-two, I shall see you again." And she watches her stagger away beneath her burden.

"Mademoiselle is generous," ventures the waiter who has followed them outside the shop.

"Nonsense! It is my whim. She is a dying girl. It is written. And her Paul. A fine, selfish scamp, I'll warrant." And with a laugh and a whirl on her heel she hurries away.

* * * * *

One year in a Parisian garret. One year of green country quiet exchanged for the lullaby of Paris—that mother who often sings her babies to their deaths.

To be sure, there has always been Paul, and looking in his eyes Jeanne could forget her home-sickness. And with his arm for a pillow, her straw had not seemed such a hard bed. But he was forced to be at the theatre early and late. And nowadays his absences were growing longer. Jeanne fancied at times that he was less tender. Paul was tired—tired of being poor. Was it that Poverty was pinching Love to death? She did not know—but felt a chill about her heart—a dangerous thing when the body is also cold.

Digitized by Google

Someone else would beat the ragout on Paul's next fête day. But Paul came and went, and noticed nothing.

One night in his sleep Jeanne heard him utter a name. She leant to listen, but he said no more, only smiling in his sleep. She thought it was "Susanne." In the morning she questioned him.

"I was dreaming. What of it?" said he, evading her eyes.

Before he went away that morning he drew her fondly towards him, and tenderly kissed her rough and reddened slender hands. It was a revival of love, Jeanne thought, and sang softly to herself all that day. Life was easier after this. Paul grew more kind, and a new pleasure was also hers.

She did not know that it was a man's way when he loves one to kiss the other dumb.

And every day at noon her "saint" came for an hour. Every day in some small way, Jeanne's small wants grew smaller. Every day Seventy-one sat beside Seventy-two upon the low straw pallet, and laughed and jested until Jeanne grew merry from sheer contagion.

"We will thank her together when you are well again, my Jeanne, and find out her real name," Paul would say in his absent-minded way.

When Jeanne was well again.

One morning she seemed suddenly so weak that Paul found it impossible to leave her. For the first time he became uneasy. She did not complain, merely remaining strangely quiet. And her eyes shone as on that night beneath the lindens long ago; the night they first spoke of a marriage—their own.

"But it is nothing," she murmured, while her starry eyes looked past him across the glaring roofs so coldly bright in the wintry sunlight. It was broad day in Paris, but in Jeanne's life candle-time had come.

"Paul!"

"My Jeanne!"

"You love me?"

"My little one. How can you ask? You break my heart!"

"As dearly as ever, Paul?"

"As dearly as ever." And Paul softly stroked a very happy face.

Just then, above the lullaby with which Paris was singing Jeanne to sleep, some rollicking distant bells rang out the hour. Jeanne raised herself upon her elbow, and with one hand threw back the drooping locks from her little white ears.

"Hark!"

As they listened they heard a merry clatter of high heels on the bare staircase.

"It is number Seventy-one!"

As she spoke a piquant figure stood framed within the low doorway.

"Paul!—my saint!"

And then the two stood alone in the little sunny garret, for just at that moment Jeanne's soul fled.

"Susanne! You—her saint!" and with a hoarse cry Paul dropped the dead hand on the straw.

"And so—to her, you were Paul! Great Heaven!"

And Jeanne?

A little smile stole softly about her lips. It was Death, who in joke had tricked Life out of one sorrow.

JESSIE MILLER.

"Did you hear Kusser has dyspepsia?"

"No. How did he get it?"

"Slugem made him eat his own words."

Tommy: "Oh, father, mother said she was a donkey."

Father: "I am glad to hear she told the truth for once, my boy."

Tommy: "Yes, she said she was a donkey to have married you."

Flossie: "Are you sure you love me, and that you'll never look at another woman?"

Willie (fervently): "Yes, on my honour."

Flossie (coldly): "No, then; I don't want to marry a freak."

Johnny grumbled at his small share of pudding one day.

"It's a liberal helping," said his mother.

"Then I'll have a conservative helping," said Johnny and wanted to take the dish. Oh, these political kidlings!

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 8

One half of the sovereigns offered this week were set aside for the members of the great Jones family. One of them has been claimed by:

Mrs. A. JONES, 10 Whitworth Place, Plumstead, Kent.

Four of the remaining twenty-five sovereigns have been applied for by:

H. PELLING, 21, Temple Street, Brighton.

E. A. WALTON, 103 Fitzwalter Road, Sheffield.

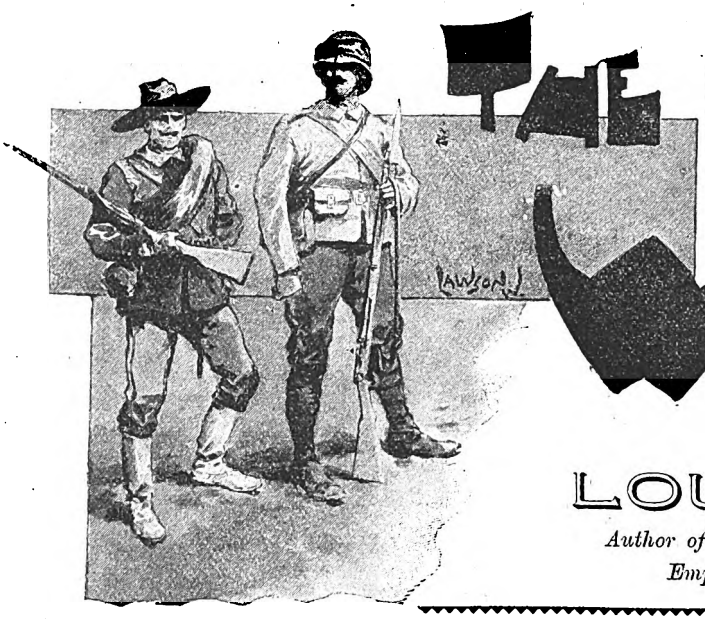
A. SWEET, 50 Portman Street, Rowbarton, Taunton.

F. WOODFORD, Stamp Office, Poole, Dorset.

The unclaimed sovereigns were addressed to:

A. D. Allan, 458 Gallowgate, Glasgow; Jabez Attwood, Union Street, Stourbridge; A. C. Quick, Church Square, Guernsey; Miss E. Beal, 33 Basuto Road, Poole Park, Fulham; J. Ramsden, 176 Albemarle Street, Ashton-under-Lyne; G. F. Matthews, 20 West Street, Chichester; Miss A. Bullock, Blaby House, Drayton Road, King's Heath, Birmingham; G. F. Saunders, 37 North Road, Bishoston, Bristol; Mrs. Reichert, 5 Windermere Villas, Tottenham Lane, Hornsey; T. Carpenter, 17 Bridge Avenue, Hammersmith; J. Jackson, 5 Hanover Place, Coleraine; J. Begrie, 172 Causewayside, Edinburgh; T. E. Gooden, 19 Park Street, Bolton; Jos. Broster, Band, H.M.S. Ganges, Falmouth, Cornwall; G. Singler, 57 Poplar Walk, Herne Hill, S.E.; S. K. Hocking, 18 Avenue Road, Crouch End, N.; John White, Livery Stables, The Avenue, Minehead; W. Toon, Grove Villa, West End, Faroham; Jas. Rees, 43 Surrey Street, Ryde; Geo. Hall, 3 Regent Street, Hinckley, Leicestershire; J. Steel, 89 Frankfort, Street, Gateshead; J. B. Jones, Church Road, Redditch; Miss Jones, High Street, Wallingford; J. Jones, Red Lion, Corn Street, Witney; W. B. Jones, farmer, Barrow-on-Humber; Mrs. Jones, The Manor House, Finchley; Miss C. Jones, 2 Crescent Terrace, Cheltenham; John Jones, Barrack Street, Castlerea; Mrs. Jones, 1 Solent Place, Bath Road, Lymington, Hants; W. Jones, Newport Road, Cowes; Mrs. Fenton-Jones, 12 King Edward Street, South Hackney; A. Jones, 21 Silver Street, Wisbech; W. R. Jones, 128 Denmark Road, Lowestoft; Mrs. Jones, Downham, Norfolk; H. Jones, Strafford Villa, Moorgate Road, Rotherham; F. Jones, 4 Howden Place, Leeds; Thos. Jones, Station Road, Wombwell; Miss Jones, 8 Studley Road, Harrogate; Thos. Jones, 18 The Lound, Kendal; E. Jones, Tiffin Lane, Workington; T. A. Jones, Smedley Street, Matlock; Jas. Jones, Hoo Ash House, Ravenstone, Ashby-de-la-Zouch; S. Jones, 5 Trinity Street, Stockton-on-Tees; O. G. Jones, Staff Sergt.-Major, 8 Albany Place, York Town, Surrey; Geo. Jones, Sandy Lane, Worksop.

Digitized by Google



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XLI.

The Shadow of Doom.

In one of the chief streets of St. Petersburg stands an imposing house, whose bold façade seems to challenge the gaze of the passer-by and to thrust itself forward with proud security in that great City of Despair.

No one would dream of associating it with intrigue or crime. Not the secret police themselves, as they slunk along in unsleeping watchfulness, had ever looked upon it with distrust. As its powerful owner passed in and out, he was greeted with deference; for his influence was great in high quarters, and his arm was long and merciless.

And yet within a fortnight of the passing of the British army into Central Asia, a strange meeting and a strange conversation took place within this princely house, which would indeed have exercised the speculation of the police could they have been present in secret.

He was greeted with deference.

On a certain afternoon in June, an officer of the Imperial Guard sat in the spacious library, engaged intently in examining a series of maps and statistical tables which lay exposed, carefully drawn and coloured, with many curious marks and signs, upon the table. He wore the rich uniform of the royal service, but he was clearly not occupied at the moment with royal business.

It was Pochowski, the man of many parts—now lionised as a Russian tenor in London drawing-rooms, now a humble valet in the service of a British ambassador—now an imperial officer—clearly one of varied acquirements and singular adaptability—practised in disguise, and playing in the seclusion of his own house alone his real part.

He looked up from the documents he was examining, and hastily glanced at the clock. Then he drew down the shutter of his desk, threw himself into an easy-chair and waited.

His thoughts wandered to the stupendous, the sublime task which he had made the object of his life's mission, a task to which he had sacrificed everything, love, honour happiness, and for which he had courted danger and death.

For he was one of the brave champions of Russians freedom. He strove to attain nothing less than the liberty of his native land and the deliverance of her people. And now the hour seemed to approach, the hour of destiny, for him, for the throne, for the great Empire of the East.

"Count Lucovitch, sir."

It was his servant who thus broke in upon his reveries.

Pochowski rose. As he did so, a tall officer, of noble aspect, with stern, resolute face, and firm stride, entered the room and bowed with a touch of ceremony.

"You have not failed me," said Pochowski. "We have but one hour and we must lose no time."

"An hour? What do you mean?" asked his visitor in surprise.

"Count," said Pochowski gravely, "in an hour the fate of Russia will be decided. We shall meet the Provincial Presidents. We shall decide whether we shall take this supreme opportunity which Providence has given us, of winning independence for our country and freedom for our people, or let the tale of Russian servitude roll garrulously on for another century."

"I have consented to discuss with you, Captain," Lucovitch observed, "this torturing position. I have not consented to take a part; much less to give assent so soon. Our country is now in danger. Is it not the first duty of patriotism to rid our shores of foreign enemies before we turn to rend ourselves?"

Pochowski took from a cabinet at his side a bundle of papers and rapidly glanced through them.

"These are the reports handed to me as Supreme Head of the Nihilist Party," he said at last. "At the present moment there are 640,000 of Russia's bravest sons ready to take the field if called upon to vindicate their liberties. It needs but a word, and a vast host of indomitable spirits will swarm round the capital and crush it in their grip."

Digitized by Google

"What!" cried the Count, in tones of horror, whilst the Tsar is thus beset?" claimed

"Count Lucovitch, sir."

"Precisely, sir," ex-Pochowski in commanding tones. "The blow must be struck now or never. Can you conceive it possible that if the Tsar wins this infamous war, we shall ever again have such a chance, when the hand of despotism is strengthened and the champion of liberty is hurled to the dust? Let us by all means be patriots. But what is patriotism? It is to fight for the people, for their freedom, for the restitution of their manhood; not for tyranny and oppression, villainy and dishonour. Now is the moment of destiny. The whole world is fighting its great battle of independence. Do you think this is merely a squabble of nations, merely a bout between England and her foes? You cannot. It is a war of principles. Oppression is striving for universal despotism. Liberty is striving for universal peace, for the true brotherhood of man. If England is beaten, we are all beaten, humanity is beaten with her. The light of freedom goes out; man crawls back into his chains; the dungeon once more gapes open. Yes, in such a struggle mere selfish and narrow patriotism is swallowed up. We must side, not with Russia or with England, but with right or wrong, with peace or war, with liberty or servitude. And in such a moment are we, we of all men, who suffer most, who have most to gain, to throw in our strength with the forces of evil, and hurl back the splendid birth-hour of a universal freedom? No, Count, your heart is too generous to harbour such a thought. We call upon you to become our general in the field. To you is intrusted the task of leading an invincible army to certain victory in a holy cause."

Pochowski's eyes glowed as he spoke thus passionately, and a pallor came over the Count's face. He was visibly moved.

"All this I see and admit," he remarked after a pause. "But I am a soldier, and how can I side with the invaders of my own country? It is this that haunts and disturbs me. How can we, in the cause of Russia, call in Russia's foes?"

"I might reply," answered the other quietly, "that in freedom's cause it is both natural and usual. Did not England call Holland in to help her, and America, France? Nay, the Dutch, too, sought the armies of Germany, and Germany those of England. And who more fit to help us than the great nation which has made liberty her watchword and is the bulwark of humanity? But I will not urge such pleas. Count, there is another point of view which I will lay before you."

"Ah! You have some scheme?"

"Let us be diplomats as well as soldiers," tranquilly replied Pochowski. "I will place before you the two only possibilities. I reject Russia's victory over England. You yourself cannot deny that, in such an event, our cause is lost for ever. Not we alone but the whole earth will groan in servitude. Such a prospect we cannot even glance at. Let us, I say, reject it. Now, in the first place, England may conquer the Tsar and his armies—I do not say Russia, for it will not be Russia. The true Russian secretly longs for England's victory. England may conquer—I say she must and will conquer—the Tsar's armies. She will sweep over our country and seize the capital. We shall be in the grip of a foreign nation. She will dictate her terms to us. Mind you, I do not fear that. I should welcome it, for I have confidence in England. She will give us our liberty. She will drive away the baneful breed of despots whose madness it is to believe themselves God-ordained autocrats of countless subjects. But how do you like such a situation? Would you prefer to have your rights given to you, not by yourself, or by your Tsar, but by a foreign power? Do you prefer that we shall be pensioners on the good will of an alien race?"

The Count ground his teeth, but made no other reply. Pochowski went on:

"Well, there is your prior alternative. You do not care for it. Exactly! I guessed so. Then what is left? Clearly the course I have been advocating. If we do not care to have our freedom given to us—thrown to us—we must take it ourselves. And how? It is simplicity itself. We must summon together all the forces that we have, rouse Russia to her heart, seize the Capital, dethrone the Tsar, and make ourselves masters of our own dominions. Having done that, we shall ourselves extend the hand of alliance to our invader, cancel the war, make our peace, give her idemnity, bid her retire, and then avoid the unlovely spectacle of our capital invested, and arrangement of amnesity that shall be honourable to all. Is not that the only prudent—nay, the only noble—course that is open to us?"

Pochowski waited for a few moments whilst he allowed his words to sink into the heart of his hearer.

"But your Nihilist army," said the Count, after some reflection, "it is but a poor, ungoverned horde."

Pochowski smiled.

"You may be pardoned the belief, Count," he replied: "it is a mistake that is carefully cultivated. But do you really believe that these poor wretches who throw about bombs and assault innocent people are the heads and leaders of our great movement? Let me assure you that they are rebels to the cause rather than its guides. We cannot restrain misguided fanatics; there must always be some madmen in so great a multitude of oppressed. Nay, we cannot even direct and be certain of them. There may yet be outrage. But it is abhorrent and abominable to me, to all our officers, to the great mass of our people, and, above all, to the cause. Believe me that neither the People's Right nor the People's Will dominate to our movement. It is in high quarters, amongst men of rank and position, amongst our officers, wherever true greatness of soul animates a clear intelligence, that you must seek our leaders. When the time comes you will be amazed. Your neighbour to right and to left, your superior officer, your intimate friend, the nobleman whose patronage you seek—all will be found staunch and courageous champions of the cause. The real chivalry of Russia is on our side."

Pochowski held out his hand.

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed the Count amazed. "Do you mean that the Court itself is so deeply tinged by it?"

"Wait!" was Pochowski's reply, and he smiled grimly as he spoke. "You will see, when the moment comes, how pitifully isolated, how tragically alone, is the race of the Romanoffs. There are those upon their side, we will grant—a few fanatics like themselves, some trained to the hateful and insidious lie which support a despot's throne, most mere office-bearers and self-seekers, petty tyrants whose power is part of the greater power we seek to destroy. But when the hour of danger is at hand, how many of these will stand by and gives their lives for a hopeless cause?"

The Count rose and paced the room, and as he moved the watchful eyes of his host followed him. At length he turned, and, approaching Pochowski, said:

"Either way there is something that is distasteful. But it may be that personal pride, perhaps even personal honour, must yield to a greater principle. I have heard your arguments and admit them. I will do what you say. I will command your army, and will even lay hands upon His Majesty. But upon one condition. It is that there must be no swerving from the policy you have outlined. We, the people of Russia, shall fight our own battle of liberty, and then supreme in our own capital, bid England retire. We will grant what terms she demands. But it it must be our defence that we would ourselves spare Russia the degradation of a hostile investment, and since our government is so mad as to seek our own humiliation—that we throw it aside the better to protect the honour of our native land."

These words, spoken with quite dignity, moved his hearer. Rising to his feet, Pochowski held out his hand.

"May I die the death of a traitor and be despised of all men," he said, "if I am guilty of thought, word, or deed that is dishonourable to the true cause of patriotism."

The two men gripped each other's hands. Each was affected by the tragedy of this solemn dedication.

"It is one of the greatest moments of the world's history. So must Brutus and Cassius have felt when they swore alliance for the death of Cæsar!" It was the Count who spoke.

"I accept the omen!" cried Pochowski. "So may the new Cæsar be overthrown, and no new Anthony undo our work. But our hour is up. You must come with me. Henceforth we shall have little time for speech."

Pochowski called upon the delegates to make their statements.

The two officers descended the stairs, and, entering a carriage already awaiting them, drove rapidly off.

"Conspiracy does not always conceal itself!" declared the Count almost gaily.

"Conspiracy that conceals itself," observed Pochowski, "acknowledges itself already beaten. We are safe because we are too transparent. If you wish to avoid detection, do not shun the policeman; make love to his daughter!"

Thus jesting, they passed through some of the spacious streets of the Capital, until they reached a noble house, palatial in size, and buried amongst trees already heavy with summer foliage.

The Count started.

"Duke Paul's!" he exclaimed in amazed tones.

Pochowski nodded.

"He cannot help us, but he is with us. Blood ties cannot be rudely broken. But he is a generous patriot, and throws around us his protection. Do you not know that through his influence alone our great teacher, Tolstoi, has escaped persecution?"

The Count looked further mystified. But he made no reply. In a few moments they had entered.

Without delaying, Pochowski and his companion pressed forward, and passing through a door at the end of the passage, descended into a spacious apartment, where, scattered about in little groups, sat a score or so of men.

They rose to their feet as the President entered, and, as they observed the Count, exchanged looks of mutual satisfaction.

Proceeding to a raised chair at the end of the room, and keeping the Count by his side, Pochowski called upon the delegates assembled to make their statements.

It appeared that European Russia was divided into twenty-eight districts, each of which had several sub-divisions. In every district was a Nihilist officer of repute, whose duty it was to keep himself accurately informed of the number and strength of the multitude under his control. He was unknown to any save the sub-officers, and his sympathy with the popular party had never created a moment's suspicion in the minds of the bureaucracy. On this fateful day, summoned by urgent messages, they assembled to report themselves and to deliberate on the great step that was about to be taken.

Each in turn rose and made his brief speech. And every speech was as satisfactory as it was terse. It appeared that there were, in all, nearly 700,000 sturdy enthusiasts ready when called upon to take the field. Some of them had been trained in war, many had been exercised in drill and with the rifle. Animated by a fierce indomitable spirit of patriotic ardour, they formed a superb army which, distracted by a double invasion, the Tsar would find difficult, nay impossible, to withstand.

"You have made it clear," demanded Pochowski, when they had done, "that there is to be no outrage, no individual violence, no private revenge? And you have forbidden dynamite and such brutal instruments of carnage?"

There was a common assurance of this.

"I have done all I can," observed one (he was President of the Moscow District), "but I guarantee nothing. There are fanatics who will promise anything, but can never be trusted. Moscow," he added significantly, "has suffered much from the Imperial scourge."

"It is instant death to anyone who violates the strict rule of war," replied Pochowski sternly, and his brow became overcast. "Meanwhile, I have the pleasant tidings to impart that Count Lucovitch has consented to take supreme command in the field. He will meet you here to-morrow and give you full instructions. The blow must be struck at once."

There was a murmur of approval at this intelligence, and the officers pressed round the Count, whose knowledge of military tactics was held in high regard, and congratulated him upon the noble part he had consented to play in the liberation of his country.

"It is not altogether with a glad heart, gentlemen," he responded; "but I cannot oppose my private feelings to the supreme considerations that are before us. We shall at least be allies of England and not dependents. Our cause is the same. We fight for the liberation of Russia, and she for the liberation of the world."

In another hour's time, after some consultation and much anxious questioning, the two Nihilist chiefs drove off. Neither of them slept that night. Until early the next morning they were deep in discussion and in the examination of charts and reports and in searching criticism of the position. Before St. Petersburg rose for its breakfast its fate was determined.

And thus, when England was hurling her splendid armies upon the shores of Russia, a terrible and irresistible danger grew to monstrous maturity in the very heart of the empire, and the grim shadow of fate was creeping upon the throne itself.

It was a situation worthy of the Greek tragedian. Whilst exultant despotism, arrogant in its supremacy, was stretching out its hand for its final crown, its doom was already pronounced and its end prepared.

Dramatic irony such as this Sophocles himself would have appreciated.

CHAPTER XLII

Rodney Becomes an Admiral.

Early in July the leading detachments of the Indian army began to reach Uzun Ada, and the Naval Brigade was hurried forward among the first arrivals.

Rodney was now in command of this small party of three hundred sailors, as the senior officer originally selected for the post had the misfortune to fall ill shortly after the defeat of Alikhanoff on the banks of the Helmund.

They went on a tour of inspection.

Sir George White, the Commander-in-Chief, and his staff also travelled rapidly to the front, as the wholly unexpected success of Peyton's operations in Transcaspia had changed the aspect of affairs very materially. The government of India had always contemplated the possibility of rudely upsetting Russia's preponderance in Central Asia, but the idea of marching the Indian Army to Moscow was generally regarded as a fantastic dream which must be utterly subjugated to the practical project of breaking down the Muscovite sway on the Northern confines of Afghanistan.

But the seizure of the Transcaspian railway, and Applin's remarkable capture of nearly every available steamship on the Caspian, had altered the entire position.

Not only was Russia compelled to marshal her first line of defence to meet the British attack on the Black Sea littoral, but her Caucasian army was unable to cross the Caspian to attempt the reconquest of the lost provinces, and it now became a matter of choice between developing the movement from India into a determined effort to penetrate to the capital, and quietly consolidating resources around Merv and on the Oxus, to await the outcome of events in European Russia.

In view of these two courses it was plain that Sir George White and his men were inclined to the more audacious one.

Rodney was in Uzun Ada two days before the Commander-in-Chief, and he lost no time in examining the fleet. There were, in all, seventeen steamships, for which petroleum supplied the motive power. But they were small, with limited deck capacity, and, at the utmost stretch of accommodation, barely capable of bringing 10,000 men across the Caspian.

This inland sea, too, is liable to severe and unheralded storms, so that to crowd men into the wretched native craft that swarmed in the harbour, attracted thither by the news that roubles were now unusually plentiful, was to court disaster, whilst to attempt to occupy Baku with a small force meant absolute annihilation at the hands of Russia's best troops, the army of the Caucasus.

Rodney knew that the problem, tough as it was, must be solved somehow. He found Applin to be a congenial spirit, and discussed it with him. As the result, they went on a tour of inspection to the timber-yards and locomotive shops.

When Sir George White arrived he sent for Rodney.

"Well, sir," he said genially to Frank, "now that you are the Admiral, I must ask you how you propose to carry my army across to the other side."

"At the end of six days," said Rodney, "I will be able to land 100,000 men simultaneously at any point you may select within about thirty-six hours from the time of departure from this port."

"What?" shouted the Commander-in-Chief, astounded at this reply. "Surely it is impossible! They can't swim there, you know."

The sailor modestly disclaimed any such flight of genius as was suggested by the retort. He explained that there were eighty engines at present gathered on the sidings at Uzun Ada, together with 2,000 waggons. There was an ample supply of timber available elsewhere, and he believed that by utilising the labour of every man in the place, something like forty gigantic rafts could be rapidly knocked together, whilst two engines per raft might be converted, with equal ease, into a modified form of the American rear-driving paddle-wheel principle. Each raft would hold 2,000 men with stores. They would be fitted with sweeps to eke out the steam power, and the steamers would accompany them to safeguard against accident. The remainder of the troops could go on the steamships, and in the best of the native craft, but very few horses could be taken in the first expedition.

Rodney came to the interview prepared with plans and estimates of labour, and five minutes after the Commander-in-Chief was made fully acquainted with the details he accorded his hearty approval to the proposal, and the naval officer was given carte blanche with regard to men and money.

As the work went on it was deemed desirable to reduce the number of troops to 75,000, and to increase the space for horses and guns. Never stranger craft navigated the sea than these ingeniously constructed rafts, which when fully loaded were almost submerged. But the locomotives, fixed fore and aft, were placed on elevated platforms, and the first experiment showed that with steam alone a speed of two miles an hour was obtainable, whilst with long sweeps, each manned by twenty strong-armed soldiers, this rate of progress was almost doubled.

Tommy revelled in the congenial task of christening these giant monsters. Officially, they were known by numbers, but this suited not the eclectic taste of the "swaddy."

Thus, No. 1 was called "Sudden Death," because a structural weakness at one end caused the sensational disappearance of an engine into the depths of the Caspian during the trial trip. No. 2 became "Lady Godiva," on account of a certain simplicity in outline which was found to be most convenient after experiment had shown the faults of the first construction. Nos. 5 and 7, built side by side, were dubbed respectively "Caster" and "Pole-axe."

"Admiral" Rodney hoisted his flag on the Sarmarkhand, the largest and most powerful of the Baku-Uzun Ada fleet, and it was a proud moment for him when he led the gigantic procession of ships, rafts and dhows through the tortuous entrance channel and out into the open sea.

Everyone believed that an attack was to be made on Baku.

An unwonted degree of openness was manifested by Sir George White in discussing the possibilities of effecting a surprise during the hours of darkness by an unexpected landing in that neighbourhood, and the imprisoned officers of the Caspian steamers were closely questioned as to the conformation of the coast-line and the main features of the approach by water, with the possibilities of defence.

There was consequently much perturbation when it was discovered, on the morning of July 27th, the day fixed upon for the sailing of the expedition, that a steam-launch had been mysteriously cut from her moorings in the night and was now well on her way to Baku, with half-a-dozen Russian officers on board.

The people who seemed to care least about the occurrence were those primarily responsible for it.

Sir George White and Rodney were supremely indifferent to the obvious fact that, thus forewarned, the Grand Duke Paul would make it very hot indeed for the invaders, but this nonchalant attitude was somewhat explained when the troops saw the sun rise over the waste of waters after their first night on the rafts, and found that instead of sailing due west to Baku they were heading north-west to Petrovsk.

Digitized by Google

"Well, sir," he said genially to Frank, "now that you are the Admiral, I must ask you how you propose to carry my army across to the other side."

"We are a lot of silly jossers," said the humble philosopher of the Royal Fusiliers whom we met before at Karachi. "Anybody with a grain of sense could ha' seen that we shouldn't land on the south side of the Cowkysus. We're a-going to Mosky we are, an' it ain't likely we'd stick a lot of bloomin' mountings in the way when we can sail round 'em. There's no flies on Sir George, is there?"

There were no flies on Private Watson either. He had correctly read the Commander-in-Chief's strategy, and at dawn on the following morning he and the rest of the 7th, with some Ghurkas and Bengal Infantry, occupied two lively hours in clearing Petrovsk of the few Russian troops who held it.

The work of disembarkation proceeded rapidly. As fast as regiments landed they were hurried forward through the town to occupy a low range of foot hills through which ran the line to Moscow, Petrovsk being the terminus of that railway on the north of the Caucasian range.

It was well that great energy was shown in the matter, as the Russians, though taken by surprise, strove bravely to remedy their mistake, and it was clear, from the rapid concentration of troops that was going on some few miles inland, that a determined assault would be delivered on the British at the earliest possible moment.

It came, hotly enough, during the afternoon.

The Russian general in command at Vladikavkaz hurried up some 20,000 infantry, three sotnias of Cossacks, and fifty guns, and dashed at the English position with great intrepidity.

So severe and determined was the assault that it assumed the character of a hand to hand struggle. Reinforcements were arriving on both sides, but it was far easier for the Russians to hasten up their supports than for the Indian army, with inadequate-landing places, without cranes or steam power on shore, and delayed by the unwieldy nature of the rafts in a shallow harbour abounding in sand-pits—distant also some miles from the scene of the encounter—to strengthen the fighting line.

From the beginning of hostilities the advance division was outnumbered. It suffered terribly from the fact that the Russian guns were unopposed by artillery, and Sir George White, who conducted the defensive operations in person, was devoutly thankful when Colonel Doyne's brigade of cavalry appeared in the rear.

This consisted, it will be remembered, of the 4th Royal Irish Dragoon Guards, the 5th Lancers, the 2nd Bengal Lancers, and the 7th Bengal Cavalry.

The afternoon was well advanced as they came up at the trot, but the blazing sun still rode high in the heavens, and the drifting sand-clouds obscured everything in the front, except that through the murky air occasional puffs of smoke, and deep red jets of flame showed where the devastating guns of the enemy were located.

After a weary plod through the sands, Colonel Doyne wisely relegating the pace to a walk, the troopers reached the right of the fighting line.

The sun at last set over the distant hills in a deep crimson glow, but the dust still rising over the scene rendered any intelligible idea of what was going on impossible to the newcomers.

The Royal Fusiliers and the Hampshire Regiment were at this moment bearing the brunt of the attack, both regiments being in extended order, with the 5th Ghurkas and the 2nd Bengal Infantry in support.

Digitized by Google

The Russians kept up a furious cannonade, firing salvoes of six guns with shrapnel, and Colonel Mortimer, of the Fusiliers, who commanded the fighting line, sent word to Sir George White that he could only hold his position and attack the enemy's skirmishers, whilst an advance was out of the question.

It assumed the character of a hand-to-hand struggle.

The Commander-in-Chief dispatched a aide-de-camp to acquaint Colonel Doyne with the position of affairs, and to ask him if he thought his brigade could silence the guns.

The cavalry commander answered with a smile: "I will try." He at once gave the necessary orders for the performance of his desperate plan, which was to deliver an unexpected attack upon the enemy's right—this, too, during the uncertainty of darkness, and against unknown odds.

The brigade moved quietly off without attracting Russian notice, and they were soon completely hidden from view by the undulating ground.

Withthe sudden change peculiar to the region, darkness, was now fast setting in, although but little more than an hour previously the sun was visible. The moon rose soon after, and there was something inexpressibly weird in the strange spectacle of the dark mass of men and horses silently advancing through the now almost insupportable dust-clouds, whilst through an occasional rift a bright steel scabbard or glittering curb-chain would gleam for an instant.

Meanwhile the noise and turmoil and lurid blaze of the conflict raging on the left only became more fearful in their intensity.

At last the brigade crossed the intervening ridge, having gained the position desired by Colonel Doyne, and as the dense body of moving cavalry showed against the bright background of moonlit sky and arid earth, they were perceived by the enemy.

Directly in front, and about three-quarters of a mile away, were the guns, and as soon as the Russians became aware of the existence of a British force in this new direction, they devoted all their attention to the movement. Twenty guns quickly changed front and shells soon screamed through the air, shrapnel exploded and sent its missiles tearing and hissing on all sides, whilst the numerous tiny flashes in the enemy's lines, followed by the pinging sound of the bullets, showed that their infantry were at work. Fortunately the Russian aim was high, and the brigade took ground to the right to still further disconcert it. But the advance could no longer be delayed, for by this time Colonel Mortimer must be hard pressed in his difficult position.

As the brigade moved forward, the Russian artillerymen again saw them, and now the enemy's fire became more fatal, for men and horses began to drop out of the ranks. The cavalry advanced in echelon from the left, preceded by the 2nd Bengal Lancers, and, under cover of these, the 4th Dragoon Guards and the 5th Lancers formed to deliver their charge with the 7th Bengal Cavalry in support.

Colonel J. J. S. Chisholme, of the 5th Lancers, the brigade major, passed the thrilling words along the line:

"The cavalry are to charge those guns."

As this order was repeated from squadron to squadron, these gallant soldiers straightened their stalwart figures in the saddle, and set their teeth hard as they looked at the seething cauldron of fire and smoke into which they were shortly to plunge. Even the very horses felt that some desperate deed was imminent, for they pawed impatiently and clanked their accoutrements in the wild desire to be moving. Fatigue, hunger, and thirst vanished to the winds.

If there came to that band memories of home and friends, they were banished by the proud consciousness that the honour of England was intrusted to their keeping at that supreme moment. Each man knew that the lives of his struggling countrymen in the main body depended upon his success, and he thought with rage of the dear comrade who, five minutes ago, was riding carelessly by his side, but who now lay rolling in the agonies of death upon Russian soil.

Captain Adams, of the 5th Lancers, was adjusting the chin-strap of his helmet when a voice behind him said:

"It's a warm shop here, sir!"

Turning in the saddle, he saw his soldier servant—a sturdy Yorkshireman named Bolland, who hailed from his own parish—grinning at him from the front rank of the troop.

"You here, Bolland?" said the Captain sternly, for his faithful comrade was supposed to be sick in hospital from a slight attack of fever. "You had no business to be on parade to-night."

"No business, sir! Do you think I would stop behind when the regiment was going into action? Lor' bless you, sir, no fear!"

This reply was unanswerable, and now everyone felt that the period of waiting had passed, for Colonel Doyne rode rapidly to the front of the brigade.

The shot and shell were falling fast on all sides. It was a curiously helpless sensation to be so hotly fired at in the dark.

Two officers in the 2nd Bengal Lancers instinctively reined their horses close together whilst they exchanged a friendly hand pressure.

"Hope to meet you at the mess to-night," said one.

"Same to you, old chap, and a Happy New Year when it comes," was the cool response.

Then Colonel Doyne's voice rang out clearly through the gloom:

"Now we have them! Trot—gallop—charge!"

The last word electrified every pulse like a galvanic shock.

Away dashed the host of men and horses, right into the teeth of the leaden hailstorm, amidst dust, and smoke, and spurts of bright fire. Their path lay straight ahead, and they followed a guide in the Brigadier who would only falter when laid low by the enemy.

"Hope to meet you at the mess to-night."

A brief but maddening rush through the whizzing bullets and terrific sand-clouds raised by the galloping hoofs, and they were among the Russians. Like a living steam-hammer they pounded down upon the molten group of guns and men, rendered fiery by the flame of the last terrible volley which sought to check the impact of the British troopers.

But the effort was in vain. The long bright sabres flashed in the air as they dealt death to the struggling artillerymen, and the powerful horses crushed irresistibly through the wavering infantry which lay beyond the guns.

Digitized by Google

Doyne's horse was shot under him, but mounting another that was riderless, he still led the van as they swept the enemy off the field, for the Russians forthwith abandoned guns and position.

Captain Adams had cut down two of a group of stubborn gunners who seemed to prefer death to an ignominious flight, when he suddenly saw Bolland hard pressed by a trio of Cossacks, one of whom was an officer. He spurred hard to get alongside the youngster in time, but he was too late, for the Cossack officer wheeled his horse to the rear and stabbed the brave Yorkshireman in the back.

With a frenzied yell Captain Adams galloped up and gave the cowardly Russian such a hearty blow that he nearly severed the man's head from his body. The others made off at top speed.

Bolland had fallen from his horse, and Adams, hastily dismounting, bent over his prostrate figure.

"My poor boy, are you much hurt?" he asked, with keen anxiety in his voice, for Bolland was born on his own estate, and could not be gainsaid from following the squire's son into the Lancers.

"Yes sir. It's all over with me, I'm afraid," was the feeble response. "That beggar's sword passed through my back and came out of my right breast."

"You must not despair, Bolland," said the officer, though the words almost choked him. "The ambulance will soon be here, and with care you'll get set up again."

"There's no chance of that, Captain. I'm done for. But I saw you drop him, an' it served him right. Oh, I'm dyin'!"

Captain Adams gave the Russian a hearty blow.

For a moment it seemed as though he had breathed his last, but Adams found that his heart was still beating, and he remembered that he had a small flask of brandy in his sabre-tache.

He poured some of the liquor into Bolland's mouth, and its influence revived him for a moment, but it was too evident that he was sinking fast.

In a short space he began to talk again, and his words reverted to the familiar tongue used in his Yorkshire home, such as he knew long before he was drilled and smartened into being a spruce cavalryman.

"Captain," he said, "ye'll leuk after t' puir awd mother, A knöa, for she's nöabody left to care for her now!"

"Heaven knows I will, if I am spared," was Adams's earnest answer.

"Ye'll be spared right eneuf, sir," said Bolland weakly. "Tak' ma word for 't."

Adams could not answer him, for the tears were in his eyes, but the dying Lancer went on:

"And, Captain."

"Yes," answered Adams.

"Tell 'em, when you reach t' awd country, that A died like a true Yorkshireman, one of t' right söart, and that afore A dropped A'd fixed four of 'em."

"Yes, yes, my lad; you will not be forgotten."

"Thank you, Captain. Remember—poor—awd—mother, and may God—bless her—and you—and all t' föaks at höam. Oh! Captain, it's over. Goodbye. If A could see t' little plëace—once more—it 'ud be easier."

As he uttered the last words the young Lancer raised his head and shoulders with a spasmodic effort, and then fell back upon the sand. His features relaxed from their drawn fixity. A smile came over them. He had added one more name to the glorious death-roll of England's brave soldiers.

When Adams regained his troop the battle was at an end, and the remainder of the disembarkation was effected, quietly and uninterruptedly.

Whereupon "Admiral" Rodney steamed off again to Uzun Ada, towing his rafts in order to bring across the rest of the Indian Army in two sections.

This duty he accomplished in five days, and he then left his warrant officers to carry on the work of forwarding stores to the base at Petrovsk, whilst he made haste to reach headquarters, which by this time were located at Vladikavkaz. Rostoff, on the Moscow line, was already in British hands. With the army of the Caucasus safely locked up behind the impenetrable barrier of snow-clad mountains, it was but a matter of a few days for the railway to be repaired where it had been destroyed by the Russians, and for Sir George White to meet Lord Methuen.

England had now nearly 400,000 men in European Russia. (To be continued.)

She: "You say you would do anything for me, Charlie."

He (fervently): "I would, darling."

She: "Well, you know how frightfully red my hair is, I want you to dye yours red, just to keep me in countenance!"

May: "You wouldn't think from her looks that she is one of the newly rich and has forced her way into society."

Old Boy: "No; but you might be sure of it from the looks of every other woman in the room."

Little Girl: "I'm afraid to go to sleep in the dark."

Mamma: "Nonsense, dear; remember that little angels are with you."

Little Girl (ten minutes later): "I can't go to sleep, mamma. One of the angels is biting me."

"I don't think this ham is perfectly cured, my dear," said Mr. Newlywed.

"Well, what shall I do, Tom?" asked the sweet young wife anxiously. "Send it back to the shop or telegraph for the doctor?"

Miss Clara: "You say, Ethel, that you only paid sixpence for having your gloves cleaned? Why, only the other day I was actually asked ninepence!"

Miss Ethel (with a slight but not dangerous cough): "Indeed, dear, but I suppose the size is considered!"

Mother: "Johnny, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Here you sit in bed yet, while the sun has been up for hours."

Johnny: "Yes, but the sun is warm, while I am always cold when I get up. There are different kinds of sons, and you've got them mixed up."

A young rascal on one side of the road pinned something to the coat-tails of a passer-by, and as the man went across the street, several persons saw it and smiled. A second boy ran up to the man and said:

"Mister, there's a card pinned to your coat. Let me take it off."

"How did that get there?" said the man.

"One o' them ragamuffins put it on, I s'pose."

"The young wretches! Well, here's a penny for you."

Two minutes later, the good little boy pinned it on to another man, and his partner on the other side collected another penny.

Digitized by Google

LILLIE POWDER.

FOR GENTLEMEN after Shaving.

FOR GENTLEWOMEN on the Toilet Table.

A Beautiful Complexion

Is assured in a few months by using LILLIE POWDER, which is absolutely the finest preparation for the Complexion, owing to its Medicinal Qualities.

PREPARED FROM THE ORIGINAL RECIPE, invented by MRS. LANGTRY.

Her Majesty's Perruquier

. . AND . .

Lillie Powder.

"The Majority of much advertised toilet powders are most injurious to the skin. Mixed in large quantities, the ingredients are often prepared in wrong proportions. LILLIE POWDER is prepared under my strict personal supervision; and I hereby guarantee that each box is dispensed according to the original recipe."
(Signed) WILLIAM CLARKSON.

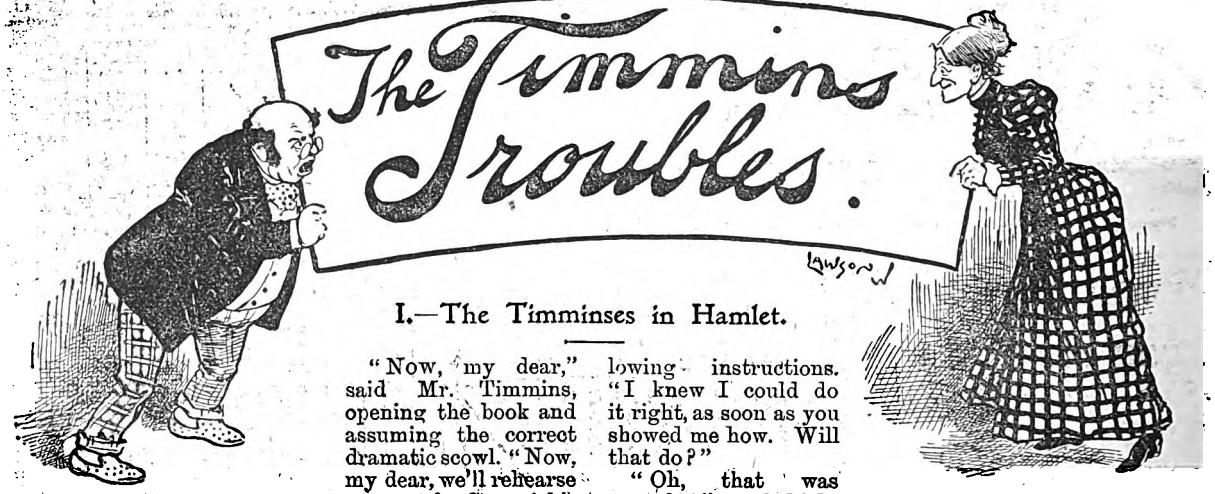
THREE TINTS: Blanche, Naturelle and Rachel. EXQUISITELY PERFUMED.

TO BE HAD OF ALL THE BEST CHEMISTS AND HAIRDRESSERS.

PRICE ONE SHILLING. BY POST, 1s. 2d.

The LILLIE SYNDICATE, 3 HENRIETTA ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google



I.—The Timminses in Hamlet.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, opening the book and assuming the correct dramatic scowl. "Now, my dear, we'll rehearse our part for Specwick's theatricals. I'm to be Hamlet, and you're to be the Queen, and we want this thing to go off all right. The hardest part we have to play together is where I accuse you of poisoning my father, and we had better try that until we get it perfect. I'll commence:

"'Now, mother, what's the matter?'"

"Well, I was thinking whether I had better wear my black silk or my maroon dress," returned Mrs. Timmins, sticking her fingers in her mouth reflectively. "Do queens wear——"

"Will you be kind enough to tell me what pack of cards you got that idea of a queen from?" demanded Mr. Timmins, fixing his wife's eye with a glare. "Do you suppose that the Queen sent for Hamlet to get his opinions about bargains in millinery? When I say that, you must say: 'Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended!'"

"Oh, I understand," pleaded Mrs. Timmins. "I thought you asked me what I was thinking about. I didn't know you had commenced the play."

"Well, you be careful this time," recommended Mr. Timmins, in a tone of solemn warning. "This is a play, this is. Do you think you know the difference between a play and a bankrupt sale?" he repeated:

"'Now, mother, what's the matter?'"

"There's nothing the matter now," replied Mrs. Timmins, straightening up and preparing to be Queen as soon as her turn came. "Go on, dear, I understand it now."

"Say it, can't you?" thundered Mr. Timmins. "Don't you know your part?"

"What shall I say, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins, looking at her husband with a dazed expression.

"Say!" roared Mr. Timmins. "Sing a comic song. Didn't I tell you what to say? Look here," and Mr. Timmins lowered his voice to the intense pitch, "have you ever read this play?"

"Why, yes!" faltered Mrs. Timmins. "You come in and stab Mr. Specwick behind the ears, and I scream."

"Hear her!" moaned Mr. Timmins, frothing at the mouth. "Stab Specwick behind the ears! That's all right. Now you scream. Scream. Why don't you? You know so much about your part, why don't you play it?"

"W-e-e-e-e!" squealed Mrs. Timmins, faithfully following instructions. "I knew I could do it right, as soon as you showed me how. Will that do?"

"Oh, that was queenly!" snarled Mr. Timmins, dropping into a chair, and regarding his wife with rolling eyes. "Just do that again! Four of those dramatic efforts will make this play the greatest of modern entertainments! Do it once more!"

"It hurts my throat," complained Mrs. Timmins. "Can't we make it do with one scream, dear?"

"Mrs. Timmins," said her husband, with unnatural calmness, "there's been some mistake made in this thing. You should have been cast for Ophelia."

"What does he do?" inquired Mrs. Timmins.

"She was an idiot from birth, and afterwards went crazy," explained Mr. Timmins. "That was the part for you."

"Then I'd rather be Queen," returned Mrs. Timmins, bridling a little. "Now, dear, let's begin all over again, and I'll do it right this time."

"You can't do it worse," growled Mr. Timmins. "I'll try it once more, just to see what kind of foolishness you are capable of.

"'Now, mother, what's the matter?'"

"We-e-e-e," squeaked Mrs. Timmins, satisfied that she was perfect this time. "'Hamlet! oh, Hamlet!' we-e-e-e!"

"Turn it off!" yelled Mr. Timmins, springing from his chair, and capering round the room as though a mad dog had bitten him. "What's the matter?"

"We-e-e-e!" squealed Mrs. Timmins, profoundly impressed with the idea that the play was still going on, and that she had at last mastered its intricacies.

"Will you ever shut up?" gasped Mr. Timmins, wilder than ever to think his wrath was mistaken for acting. "Have you got some kind of a notion that the Queen's a foghorn?"

"I did just as you told me, dear," argued Mrs. Timmins, completely taken aback by her husband's criticism. "You said I was to scream when you asked me what the matter was. Didn't I do it right?"

"Oh, that was right!" shrieked Mr. Timmins. "You struck the keynote of high art both times! I'm going to fit you out with a hair trunk and a pair of hoofs, and start you for a menagerie! Such talent as that can't be wanted on any cheap Shakespeare plays while I've got the money and influence to get you a job in the legitimate circus," and Mr. Timmins kicked the book through the window, and buried himself in his evening paper.

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. Set Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £50 to £2,000 To tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ORGANETTES 1/ MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.

DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

Who would be without a

MUSIC STAND

Folding and Portable, Square legs, Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/-

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8/6. Carriage Paid.

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

Joseph Riley & Sons,

Constitution Hill,

Birmingham.

LOOK HERE! To introduce our large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties we will send for Four Stamps one pair SCISSOR, and a POCKET KNIFE post free.

VARIETY COMPANY,

(Department 9) DALSTON, LONDON.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumberse me trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

KEATINGS LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENCES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers, 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.

Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

THE REIGN OF GOODWILL, CHRISTMAS, 1898.

Christmas AND New Year Cards.

Special Offers to the Readers of "SHORT STORIES."

Our Cards this Season are without question even better than before, and are the best we have ever had the pleasure of offering

SEE PRESS OPINIONS.

"These selections are very choice and really marvels of cheapness. Beauty and variety deserving the highest praise, being as perfect as it is possible to imagine or produce."—Queen of Fashion.

"We recommend our readers to send for these charming parcels if they wish to form any idea of the variety of pretty souvenirs that can be procured at the lowest possible outlay."—Weldon's Ladies' Journal.

NO. 1.—"YULE MEMORIES" PACKET.

1/- Fifty Christmas and New Year Cards. An old title but New contents. Bright and attractive Designs. Every Card different, with seasonable verses and greetings. The value here is really wonderful. Sent, post paid, 1/1.

NO. 2.—THE "CLIMAX" PACKET.

Twenty-four Splendid Cards, all of which are choice Folding Cards, usually sold at 1d., 2d., and 3d. each. A very welcome assortment when quality and quantity are required. Sent, post paid, 1/1. 1/-

NO. 3.—THE "EMPIRE" PACKET.

1/- Artistic Gems. Twelve very handsome Folding and Tri-folding Cards Fresh ideas bound to suit the popular taste. Embossed and Jewelled Designs. The majority are well worth 3d. and 4d. each; also including Novelties which are alone worth the price charged for the whole parcel. All will be delighted with this selection. Sent, post paid, 1/1.

NO. 4.—"BLACK AND WHITE" PACKET.

Twelve Fine-Art Folding Cards. Photogravure studies in black and white; fine Etchings executed in a manner superseding steel engravings; distinctive and stylish, with selected Greetings. Sent, post paid, 1/1. 1/-

NO. 5.—THE "ELITE" PACKET.

1/- Contains Six really beautiful Cards; their artistic merit is simply perfection; published at 6d. and 9d. each; elaborate designs after clever artists, with quotations by celebrated authors. A capital selection when only a few good Cards are desired. Sent, post paid, 1/1.

NO. 7.—THE "MIZPAH" PACKET.

A choice selection of Six most beautiful Folding Flora Cards with carefully chosen Religious Verses by FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL and H. M. BURBRIDGE; also with this packet is presented a very chaste Booklet, entitled, "The Way, the Truth, and the Light." Poem, which cannot fail to please. Sent, post paid, 1/1. 1/-

NO. 8.—"S. S. TEACHERS'" PACKET.

1/- Contains Four Sixpenny Packets—Goodwill, Flowers of the Spring, The Lord Knoweth, Voices of Praise. Forty-eight Cards, all with appropriate Scripture words and Season's greetings, suitable for Sunday School classes; sure to be appreciated. Sent, post paid, 1/1.

NO. 10.—THE "COMICAL" PACKET.

More Novelties. Real fun without vulgarity. Eighteen most humorous designs, quite new, Shaped and Folding, comprising many good Jokes and Novelties with appropriate lines; very funny; also some capital Pun and Puzzle Cards usually sold at 2d. and 3d. each. Sent, post paid, 1/1. 1/-

The Most Remarkable Value ever offered by any firm.

The FANCY TRADE should send for Wholesale Catalogues and Samples of Christmas Cards, Novelties, etc., post free, 3 stamps. CHEAPEST HOUSE IN LONDON.

JOHN THRIDGOULD & CO., 18 & 20 SYDNEY STREET, COMMERCIAL ROAD, LONDON, E.

Established 1851.

Digitized by Google

ON THE BEST AUTHORITY.

Hiss.—Some of the native races of Africa—the Basutos, for instance—express their approval of an orator or a spectacle by hissing.

P.—Soap has been in use for quite 3,000 years, and is twice mentioned in the Bible. A soap-boiler's shop was found in the ruins of Pompeii. Yet there are people even in this country who scarcely know what it is.

R. E.—One of the most primitive railways in operation at the present time, is that between Atami and Ogawara, in Japan. The cars, or carriages, hold four people, two on a seat, and sitting back to back, and the train is made up of two, sometimes three, carriages. The motive power is furnished by human beings, the train being pulled along by coolies.

R. E.—Gaust, in the Pyrenees, is a small republic. Its area is just about one square mile, and it has 150 inhabitants.

J. B.—The smallest pony in the world is owned by the Marquis Cercano, an Italian horse-breeder. Its height is twenty-eight inches, and it is often harnessed to a small carriage for two persons.

I. L.—Forty-four muscles are called into play for the production of the human voice. In the case of the small boy interviewing his father, two lots of muscles are usually working, connected by a strap.

Mus.—The present system of musical notation was invented in the eleventh century.

S. N.—A cubic foot of newly-fallen snow weighs five and a-half pounds, and its bulk is twelve times that of an equal weight of water.

P. N.—The population of London equals the combined populations of Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg, and Rome.

T. H. L.—The record for wear on the part of a carpet appears to be held by one in the hall of the Shah's Palace. It is stated on good authority that it has been in use for nearly two hundred years. It is quite certain that no dirty boots are ever wiped on that.

Iberia.—Spain should be a very rich country, for her mineral wealth surpasses that of any other country in Europe. She possesses rich stores of copper, zinc, iron, silver, quicksilver, and antimony. But the Spaniards do very little in that direction, and where the work is carried on, the best posts—if not the whole concern—are in the hands of foreigners.

Colon.—Although the French have made a terrible hash of things as colonists, they go on steadily acquiring territory. During the past twenty years they have annexed 2,000,000 square miles of territory in Africa. They now have Algeria, Tunis, the Western Soudan, a large part of the Somali coast, Dahomey, the French Congo, Senegal, "the light soil" of the Sahara, and are making progress in Abyssinia.

C. C.—The coffee tree produces fruit to the age of seventy-five years.

Hal is of a statistical turn of mind. "If all the Queen's subjects were to file past a certain point, singly, how long would it take?"————Passing uninterruptedly day and night, it would take seventy years, for there are more than 450,000,000 people in the British Empire.

Carpenter.—Nails can be driven into the hardest wood in ordinary use, if they are first dipped in lard.

Coolie.—India has more species of plants than any other country; the number is given as nearly 15,000, whereas the flora of the whole European Continent contains fewer than 11,000.

Fire.—The London Fire Brigade receives more calls on Saturday than on any other day in the week.

S. J.—Among the lower classes of the Siberian population there is a law or custom which gives to a husband the right to get rid of his wife by simply tearing off her veil or other head covering. This is taken advantage of by the husband on the slightest disagreement.

Y.—The tobacco seed is so minute that any ordinary thimble will hold enough to sow an acre of ground.

V. C.—A good Arabian horse can go for twenty-four hours in summer without drinking, and for a longer time in winter, despite the fatigue of carrying a rider across the arid plains.

"Why are certain birds and animals called 'game'?" asks B. P. H.——This is a case of transferred meaning. The old Saxon word, from which our modern term is derived, meant, not the animal pursued, but the sport of pursuing. Certain birds and animals were gradually selected as the noblest quarry of knightly sport, and, in order to keep themselves, the lords of the soil placed them in a class by themselves, and protected them from all attacks, save their own, by means of laws and penalties more or less ferocious. These were the origin of our game laws, the term "game" being used to distinguish between the protected and unprotected birds and animals. Game, therefore, now means any bird or animal which may not be shot or hunted while alive or dealt in when dead, without a special license from the Revenue authorities.

R. G.—I should say the sprat is about the most difficult fish to capture alive. When caught in the ordinary way the fish dies as soon as it comes in contact with the meshes of the net.

G. P. asks: "When did people first begin to take an annual holiday by the sea?"————Of comparatively recent years. About the year 1750 a certain doctor noticed that the fisherfolk of a little hamlet—now our modern Brighton—when suffering from scrofula and other skin diseases, made a practice of washing their bodies in sea-water and binding up the affected parts with sea-weed. He began to prescribe this treatment to his patients. The new cure "caught on," and soon developed from a sanitary practice to a pastime, and it became the fashion to go to the seaside for a portion of the summer months. The people of the Middle Ages regarded the sea with horror, so much so, indeed, that a compulsory plunge into the sea was once a legal form of punishment in this country.

L. L. D. C.—A flirt, broadly speaking, is any woman who is attractive enough to be opposed to marrying, without being thereby any less likely to marry.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Dec. 20th, if intended for the Issue on sale Jan. 3rd, and dated Jan. 7th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY
MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
AND
MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

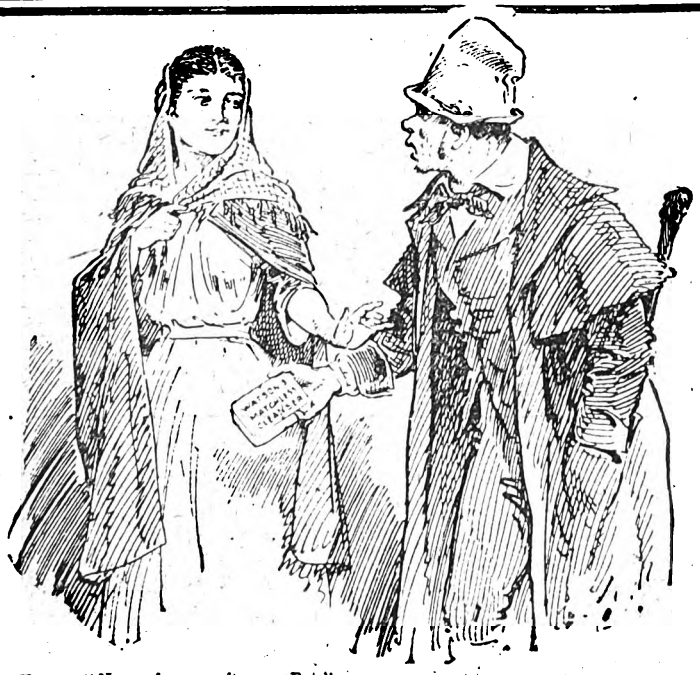
Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.
Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.
SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.
In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.



KITTY—"None of your soft soap, Pat."
PAT—"No, darlin', it's WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER I've brought ye."

The Cheapest, Purest, most Economical Soap made in this Country is

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

It does the work QUICKLY.
It does the work CHEAPLY.
It does the work THOROUGHLY.

Lathers Freely in the Hardest Water, and is equally successful in the Household as in the Laundry.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER
IS A FULL-WEIGHT SOAP.
Each Tablet weighs SIXTEEN OUNCES as against Twelve Ounces in the Short-Weight Soaps.

OF ALL GROCERS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

A 16-ounce tablet for 3d. equals 3 1. per lb.
A 12-ounce tablet for 2½d. equals 3½d per. lb.
A 16-ounce tablet for 3½d. equals 3½d. per lb.
A 12-ounce tablet for 3d. equals 4d. per lb.

AT ALL STORES.

Digitized by Google

Ask your Draper for
HOYLE'S
THOMAS HOYLE & SONS LIMITED MANCHESTER
Look for this Stamp on each piece
New Seasons Designs Now Ready
PRINTS
Warranted Fast Colours

"MATCHLESS"
WARNING to LADIES.
BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.
TEST
TRY IT ON A PENNY. Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. If it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning.
BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!
Free from Acid Poison or Grit
Largest Sale in the World
METAL POLISH.
Paton, Calvert & Co Manufacturers Liverpool

"LOUIS"
VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.
Ros aspera juvant
LOUIS XI King of France 1461-1483.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP
Longest established Purest & Best.

To save time and trouble ask for and use only
GIBSON'S STONED RAISINS
In 1 lb Packets ready for use. Stoned & Cleaned by Gibson's Patent Process without removing any nutritive part Untouched by Hand!
Retailed everywhere.
Wholesale only Wm Brown & Co of Liverpool, Ltd

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 521. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 24TH, 1898. [TWOPENCE.

TURNER'S PATENT CARRIERS.

REQUIRE NO SPANNER.

AS USED AND RECOMMENDED BY the Editors of the C.T.C. Gazette, The Hub, Cycling, Cyclist, Lancet, British Medical, Queen, Field, and Pearson's Weekly.

JUST THE THING FOR LADIES.

Away from the Steering, the Knees, and the Wind.

PATENTEE & MAKER,
H. G. TURNER,
ELDON GROVE,
MANCHESTER.

TURNER'S BI-CARRIER.

Fastens with Finger Nuts and Leather Lined Hinged Clips.

Weight of Carrier, from 1lb.

A.	14 by 6 inch top	8/6
B.	14 by 4 ,, ,, ...	8/3
C.	10 by 4 ,, ,, ...	7/6

Postage, 6d.
Other sizes to order.

Equally useful on a Gentleman's Bicycle.
Clips to fit round D and Oval Backstays are stocked.

TURNER'S SKELETON CARRIER.

Black, from 3/6
Plated, ,, ... 4/6

Suitable for carrying Luggage athwart the backstays.

THE ORIGINAL USED AT THE NAVAL, MILITARY & OFFICIAL BALLS, THE "WHITEHALL" ROOMS, & 70,000 DANCES, bears this signature & address

POSTED TO ANY ADDRESS. PRICE 3/3 & 1/10 PER TIN.

Introduced 1888. Sufficient for 400 or 200 square yards respectively.

THE VALISE FASTENS AT THE BOTTOM, THUS LEAVING ALL OPENINGS FREE.

Patent applied for.
Regd. 303999.

WRITE FOR LISTS.

Digitized by Google

HOMES BRIGHTER. AS SUPPLIED TO THE QUEEN

FOR ALL CLEANSING PURPOSES—

THE GREAT DIRT EXTRACTER

BORAX

THE 1912 ROYAL PATENT EXTRACT OF SOAP

IS "PERFECTION"

MAKES LINEN WHITE AS SNOW AND ALL CLOTHING SWEET AS NEW MOWN HAY.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE. LABOURS LIGHTER.

No. 3 WILL BE ON SALE DECEMBER 22.

Royal 3d. Magazine.

—//—

ORDER IT AT ONCE.

—//—

At all Booksellers and Newsagents.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C. Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each complete £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

GOLD RINGS

Just to induce Young Lady readers of Short Stories to wear our Jewellery, we are supplying a Special Xmas GIFT, of a LIMITED number of our now Famous Queen Gold Rings, 9ct., in plush lined case, at 1/6. As demand is sure to be great, you can only secure yours by sending P O. at once. All orders will be taken in rotation. Guaranteed to fit, and give unbounded satisfaction, or money returned in full. 1/6

QUEEN. RADCLIFFE, POLLARD & CO., Gold Ring Makers, 61 SOUTH STREET, SHEFFIELD.

12,000 Stitches a Minute.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 minutes) and Stockings, Underclothing, Fancy Goods, &c.

A LADY writes:

"I earn my living entirely by the machine."

A FATHER writes: "My little girl, nine years of age, earns as much as Five Shillings some days."

Easily learned. Cash, Hire, and Work Terms from S.T.S. Dept., 67 Southwark Street, London, S.E.; and 58 Union Street, Glasgow.

You'll Tide

OVER

Yule Tide

FESTIVITIES

Without any distressing symptoms arising through over-indulgence

BY TAKING

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

EXPELS THE OLD METHOD

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES AND MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

SHORT STORIES

No. 521. TWOPENCE.

For the Week ending December 24, 1898.

A CHRISTMAS SINNER.

By L. E. Edwards.

"'WHO's this yer Sandy Close I hear the kids talking about, Todd?'

"'Well, I never! Ain't yer never heard of old Sandy that fills the stockin's?'

"'With snowballs?'

"'No, you softy, you!'

"''Cause I was goin' to say he couldn't work none of 'is jokes off on me, 'cause my winter stockin's ain't made me yet, ner shoes, nuther. See?'

"And as the two waifs gave a simultaneous shiver, and huddled together in the wretched dry goods box, which served but poorly to protect them from the driving storm——"

The Editor of the magazine shivered even more simultaneously, if possible, rose, and, going to the shaky stove which did its dispirited best to protect him from the December blasts which whirled through the window and doors of his office, jammed into its handful of

CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

HEARTY GREETINGS FROM THE EDITOR & STAFF

All rights reserved.

Digitized by Google

reals a sheet of paper containing the above-written lines—for I am in haste to inform the intelligent reader that they were his, and not mine. Having accomplished this with the aid of a poker and the most overworked word in the English language, he went back to his desk, for the sixth or seventh time wrote the words, "The Christmas Saint" at the head of a sheet of paper, and began to say hard things at a reflection he suddenly caught sight of in a small but honest mirror which hung on the wall opposite him. That personage was not half bad looking, considering what Nature can do in the line of noses and mouths, but the Editor saw fit to go for him, and call him by the name of Diabolus.

"You think you can do the pathetic, don't you?" he sneered, scowling at the thin, harried-looking face. "The pallid-waif-and-empty-stocking song and dance. Yah! You make me tired."

"The thing's advertised, you know," suggested Diabolus brightly. "Our Christmas number will contain a powerful and pathetic story by an anonymous author—wasn't that the way it ran?"

To this the Editor scorned to reply. Instead, he wrote "The Christmas Saint" on the top of another sheet of paper, and wrote a few lines, carefully avoiding a glance at the mirror for fear of Diabolus' derisive smile. While he wrote he muttered like a stage villain.

"If I were not poor I could get some other fool to write this story. If I were not honest I could steal it. Oh, hang the empty stockings! No, I mean the waifs—great goodness, what a sentiment! Better hang empty heads. I do, every time I meet my creditors. I say, Diab, how about changing the name to 'The Christmas Idiot?' or 'Every Editor His Own Contributor?'"

"A trifle old," observed Diabolus disparagingly.

And then someone opened the door.

The Editor of the local magazine looked up with a glazed eye. It was a good magazine, and he was a good editor, but in the effort to convince the mass of readers of the former and the mass of writers of the latter fact, he was rapidly losing hair; and not only hair, but money, which can replace it; and not only money, but sleep, which can wrap a man in blissful oblivion to the loss of both. And subscribers were few, and bill-collectors many, who passed in and out that creaky-hinged door—rarely, however, closing it behind them.

The incomer, of course, was a young lady, or why should this story be written? A sparkling, smiling, pretty young lady.

She was everything that a girl should be. She brought an atmosphere of violet perfume and a vision of fresh, girlish sweetness into the room; she wore a Gainsborough hat and a Gibsonesque expression of mingled hauteur and bewitching innocence, and there was a fresh, young, wholesome ring in the voice in which she inquired crisply:

"Have you a story written for your Christmas number?"

"No, I haven't," admitted the Editor, wondering if he were an embodiment of conscience, or a contributor, which he infinitely less preferred. But in a trice the pastal white envelope was withdrawn from the stylish little sealskin muff by a shapely ungloved hand, on which a diamond sparkled.

By the primordial instincts planted in the bosoms of the sons of men, he noted that it did not bedeck the engaged finger, and so felt the greater pity as she spoke rapidly, yet shyly, with a catch in her breath.

"I have written a story—oh, I suppose you get stacks of them—but this, I think, is really good. It is about a little street waif, and is called 'The Christmas Saint.'"

"Good gracious," said the Editor with an effort, not to speak, which to him was never an effort, but to say "Good gracious!" as if he were accustomed to it.

"I hope it's good enough, and you're gracious enough to take it," said the girl almost pleadingly, and the Editor wished he were rich.

"You might leave it," he said unhappily.

The girl looked oppressively prosperous. What business had she dropping into literature with her silken skirts and her sealskins?

"My good girl," he said mentally, to see how it would sound, "this magazine can't pay its own office rent or get its Editor's overcoat out of the pop-shop, let alone pay for stories. No, I'd have to explain to her what 'pop-shop' means. Pride or truth must have a tumble, so here goes":

"You can leave it," he said again, "but I'm afraid there's not much chance; the fact is, I've half ordered a Christmas story from another man."

"He is a good writer, I suppose?" Disappointment trembled in her voice.

"Very," emphatically replied the Editor.

When the silken skirt had swished out of the doorway, leaving it looking uncommonly blank, and the high French heels sounded fainter and ever fainter down the stairs, the Editor took up "The Christmas Saint," and his eye was caught by the line written across the top of the paper: "Price £5."

Then the Editor rose in haste, and leaning his cold forehead against the cold window-pane, found relief in the utterance of words which were not "Good gracious!"

"Nothing mean about her, if she is rich, eh?" chuckled Diabolus from the mirror, whereat the Editor frowned and read the manuscript of "The Christmas Saint" very diligently.

The worst of it all was that the story was good. Despite certain traces of the amateur, despite situations slightly impossible and pathos a trifle overdrawn, it was undeniably and exasperatingly good. The Editor was indignant.

"Just the way the world goes! There's a girl who probably sits in the lap of luxury writing stories for which she wants five pounds, and which, bother 'em, are worth it; while a poor literary carpenter struggles vainly to save his journal from disgrace. Now, isn't that life?"

Diabolus nodded, and the Editor, sniffing at the portrait, rose, jammed on his hat, slammed the door after him, and went out in search of pathetic material.

"The worst thing about lies is that you've got to live up to 'em. Now, she'll watch for that Christmas story, and come out it must. Oh, 'Anon,' what crimes are committed in thy name!"

He stopped at the nearest pillar-box, and still with that undefinable feeling of resentment, dropped in a long envelope, addressed simply to "Isabel Allardyce, — Spruce Street."

"That will teach Isabel Allardyce to write better than her betters," he said, and was quickly ashamed of himself.

Then he struck off into that dingy and dreary part of the city in which a rapidly decaying aristocracy and a rapidly rising proletariat are crowded together, cheek by jowl

Digitized by Google

Here he saw shrill-voiced children capering excitedly round the scraggy Christmas trees which were exposed for sale, and boldly stripping them of twigs and branches whenever the owners' backs were turned.

But although he noted all that was going on, he saw nothing that could be made into a Christmas story, nothing that might bring tears from sentimental eyes and subscriptions from reluctant pockets.

"I suppose if I were chasing comic material I could find pathos in chunks," observed the Editor, who was so young he could not help but be cynical. "As it is I'm the most pathetic object I've come across yet. These waifs all have stockings—they've got their legs in 'em now, and will have sweetstuff galore in 'em on Christmas Eve. Everybody seems to have overcoats, and homes, and the rest of the luxuries of life—or else seems to be pretty jolly without 'em—a lesson I've not learnt yet. If your 'Christmas Saint' is prowling about, Miss Isabel Allardyce, I think he had better minister to me. Who but a girl who had seen nothing of life would draw such a character—a philanthromaniac who went wandering about at holiday-time, kindling fires on dreary hearthstones, showering unexpected gifts on deserving paupers, and so forth? Here's the true saint of Christmas, he whose good will gets us our turkey, eh, Diabolus?" and he swept his hand sarcastically in the direction of the pawn-broker's shop, opposite which his wanderings had brought him, and whose garishly-lighted window displayed to the public gaze a sad collection of forfeited pledges.

"My watch will be there next week," said the Editor philosophically, then started at some words which sounded close beside him, almost like a continuation of his own speech—words said with a hard little laugh, at which he pricked up his ears:

"I suppose the wedding-ring must go next."

"Oh, Bell, no!" said a distressed young voice, and then a strong breath of sweet, resin-scented air blown in the Editor's face reminded him of what he had scarcely noticed—that he was leaning against a wall of Christmas-trees, which hid him in the deepening dusk from the two speakers on the outside, whose hushed tones showed extreme agitation.

"Why not?" repeated the first voice, with another laugh, the bitterness of which quickly melted into a half-sob. "That's the regulation thing, you know—first the engagement-ring, then the wedding-ring, then—I don't know what, except the workhouse."

"Don't you care how you hurt him?"

"Care?" There was a cadence in this quite indescribable. "What am I doing this for? What did I write that story for? Why, I'd sing in the streets for him; I'd take in washing; I'd—oh, Betty, you're young and don't understand loving! Here, take the muff, dear, and warm your poor little hands, while I run across the street and do the deed. After all, like dying, it's over in a moment."

"Isabel Allardyce, as I'm a sinner!"

For a moment the Editor stood dazed, watching the slim figure in the shabby, stylish silken skirts, which, to his limited masculine vision, had presented so brave an appearance, speeding across the street; then, without the faintest idea why he was doing it, he sped after her.

Was it his impetuous entrance, or the blast of air brought in with him, which sent a shudder through the girl with drooping head and scarlet cheek, who stood at the end of the counter talking to the bland, beady-eyed proprietor of the "loan office?" He could not tell, but at the first glimpse at the back of his head, which, with great presence of mind he had turned, she fled from the shop like a guilty thing, while the pawnbroker gazed after her in astonishment, only equal to that with which the Editor regarded himself in the big gilt-framed mirror.

How was he to account for his precipitous entrance?

"What can I do for you, sir?" said he of the golden balls carelessly, having summed up the somewhat seedy appearance of the editorial person.

Well, it had to be done sooner or later, and why appear like an idiot simply because you are one? The Editor lingeringly drew out his watch from his pocket.

"I want to pawn this?" he said.

As he left the shop a little piece of pink cardboard attracted his attention, and he stooped to pick it up. It was the pawn ticket which young Mrs. Allardyce had dropped in her hasty flight, and, in her ignorance of matters in which the Editor was thoroughly versed, had not valued enough to come back for it.

The next evening as the Editor, after having spent all his day in writing, save about nine hours and thirty minutes which he spent in meditation, slammed his shabby hat down on his head and prepared to depart. Diabolus looked at him from the glass and remarked:

"You're a fool."

"Give us some news, can't you?" asked the Editor.

"She's married," added Diabolus.

"I don't know why," said the Editor, with much moral severity, "the fact of a woman being married and a man being unmarried should make the aforesaid man unwilling to help the aforesaid woman out of a tight place. I'll grant you that it makes her less interesting, but it doesn't make her less hungry or hard up."

As he hurried along against a sharp whistling wind which cut like a knife, he could not keep from dwelling on the bare but tragic outlines of the story he had so unwittingly stumbled on. A loyal young wife, struggling against misfortune—she did not look poor any more than she looked like a wife, which only shows how seldom we can read between the lines of human documents—a husband either halt, maimed, blind, or shiftless—probably the latter—to whom she was so tenderly devoted, that she was ready to go any lengths to spare him the least pinch of poverty.

The Editor entertained cynical views concerning marriage, but a feeling of loneliness passed like a cold wave over the spot against which his gold watch no longer beat responsive, as he remembered the tone in which she had said:

"Care for him! I'd sing in the streets for him!" He half wished he was halt, maimed, blind, or shiftless, instead of able-bodied and independent, with a savage pride of poverty which had hitherto thrust all thoughts of woman's companionship or woman's tenderness behind it.

The house to which he had sent the "Christmas Saint" was just such a house people as the Allardyces might be expected to live in, a tall, gloomy, old, family mansion at the once fashionable end of Spruce Street, now crowded with lodging houses.

"Past, grand; present, dingy; future, squalid," observed the Editor, as he rang the bell, which was answered by the younger girl, who was plainly Mrs. Allardyce's sister.

"Can I see Mrs. Allardyce?" he asked.

Betty hesitated a moment before ushering him into the immense, cheerless parlour, with its general aspect of unheated vastness. Then she disappeared with his card.

Digitized by Google

"It's the brute who sent back your story, Bell. Perhaps the Christmas feeling has thawed his heart and he's sorry."

A melancholy little laugh, like a ghost of the girlish gaiety it should represent, floated down the huge open fireplace to the Editor, and he tried to restrain his satisfaction in the old-fashioned architects, to whom a good draught was more sacred than a secret. I regret to say that he held his breath to hear the next sentence.

"If he'd bought that story you could keep the wedding ring, couldn't you?"

"Betty, be quiet! He'll hear you, and it will break his heart, as it's breaking mine. Oh, why did you start me crying when it's so important that I should look pretty?"

"Marriage," observed Diabolus to the Editor. "may make a woman less interesting, but not less coquettish."

Nevertheless, when brought face to face with Mrs. Allardyce, who was very pink, pretty, and excited, the Editor found himself in a quandary as to an explanation of his change of heart with regard to "The Christmas Saint."

"Heavens, I wish my tongue was the pen of a ready liar, as David says, or something like it. Fact is, Mrs. Allardyce," he said aloud, "that story was returned by—by my assistant before I knew anything about it."

"Oh, so you've an assistant, have you? I didn't see him when I was there."

"Well, he was somewhere about," said the Editor.

"What's his name? He must be a severe critic, to send back my poor little tale in such haste."

"He is," said the Editor veraciously. "I call him Diabolus, though that isn't his real name."

He left the house minus £5 and plus "The Christmas Saint" and a number of mingled sensations!

Firstly, Mrs. Allardyce was very, very poor; secondly, she was not used to poverty; thirdly, she was pretty to an almost surprising degree. The first two facts were as patent as the last. Fourthly, Mr. Allardyce was ill, not shiftless, for, apropos of something, she had said, with a distant air. "Mr. Allardyce is a hopeless invalid."

The Editor remarked to Diabolus that the more ill Mr. Allardyce was, the better he was pleased, and that personage retorted:

"You're a beauty to pose as a Christmas Saint, aren't you?"

For a penance he spent the next day writing a story of married love and happiness, which bade tender defiance to even the dread fates of illness, sorrow, and poverty. A noble youth figured as the good angel of the piece, and he heroically resisted the temptation to make the illness carry off the husband, and the noble youth carry off the wife.

Diabolus jeered at the story, but the Editor sent it to a daily paper, and when Mrs. Allardyce came to the office that very day with a hesitating inquiry as to whether he could use a few short sketches, and he noted, with a start, that the wedding ring was absent from her left hand, he gulped back his breath and said, "Yes, she might leave them."

"Heaven be merciful to you," said Diabolus, after she was gone.

Nevertheless, virtue was not left in solitary self-reward in this case. The day before Christmas a cheque came to the Editor in return for his story, and he thought joyfully, first of his Christmas dinner, then of his creditors, then of something else, whereupon he rose and put on his hat, and Diabolus said:

"You're a fool."

"No," said the Editor.

That evening, as he sat somewhat moodily at his desk, too depressed even to light the gas, he heard the quick click of French heels on his stairs again. He rose and threw the door open for Mrs. Allardyce, who came in flushed and panting.

"I was afraid you'd be closed," she gasped "on account of Christmas Eve. And I wanted to leave those sketches I spoke of."

"I don't take any notice of Christmas Eve," said the Editor, morosely. "Christmas is a deception."

"You wouldn't think so if you'd had my experience. See this?" holding out a hand from which the diamond ring flashed again, "I had—ah—lost this, and never really expected to see it again. It was my mother's engagement ring, and I was afraid my father would notice it was gone——"

"Your—what?"

"My father. I think I've told you that my father was an invalid."

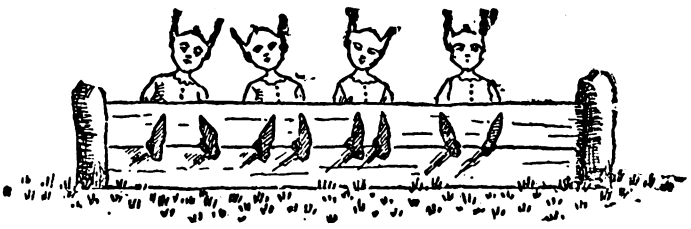
"Haven't you any husband at all?" almost shouted the Editor.

"One can live without a husband, I hope," said the young lady haughtily. "I didn't come here to be insulted, Mr. Hare."

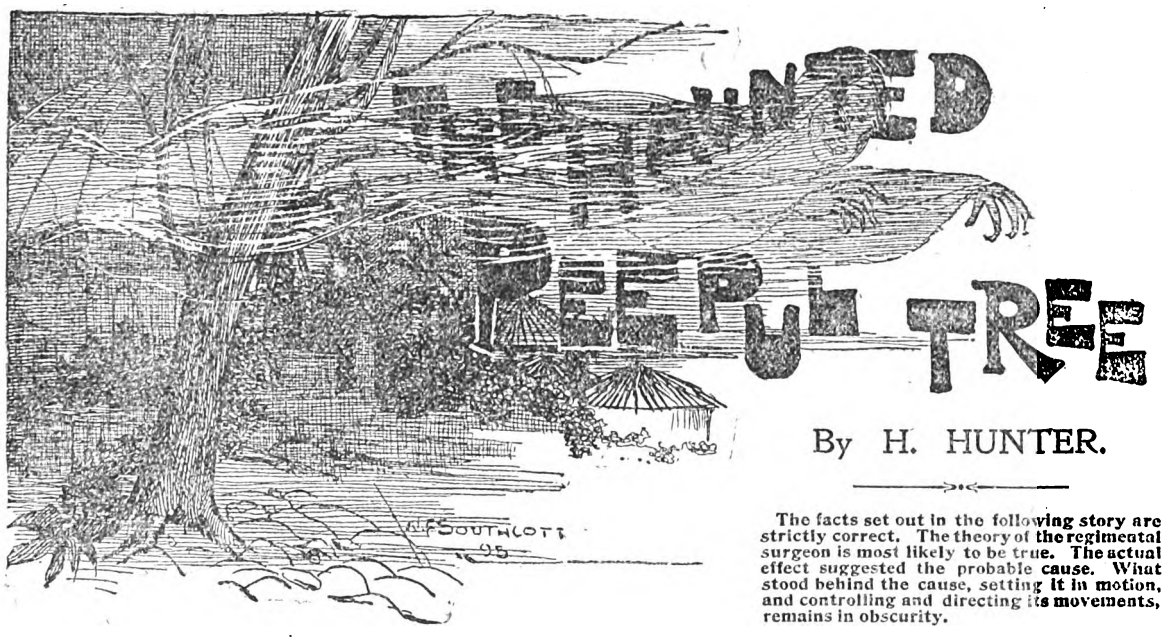
"Please forgive me," said the Editor piteously, "I'm only insane. There's been a misunderstanding, that's all. Why I've been calling you Mrs. Allardyce all the time."

"I never noticed it," said Miss Allardyce. Then, observing his expression, she went on hurriedly: "As I said, the ring was my mother's—she gave it and her wedding ring to me when dying—and this afternoon's post brought it back to me, with never a word as to where it came from. Wasn't it lovely? I think it must have been sent me by a 'Christmas Saint.'"

"Some day," said the Editor dreamily "I hope to prove to you that there's no such person."



Digitized by Google



The facts set out in the following story are strictly correct. The theory of the regimental surgeon is most likely to be true. The actual effect suggested the probable cause. What stood behind the cause, setting it in motion, and controlling and directing its movements, remains in obscurity.

I.

A SKY of brass, a dusty road, and a score of palm-thatched huts huddled together under the friendly shade of a giant banyan. A stone's cast from the road a square brick building with a white domed roof, the tomb of some pious saint or worthy Hadji, fast falling into ruins, and now used by a utilitarian Government as a police post.

Within arm's length almost, of the ancient tomb, a tall peepul tree, and under the peepul tree three figures—two white faces stooping over a black one. A short distance away, and between the tree and the tomb, three other figures with dark faces, motionless, impassive, silently looking on.

All six figures are clad in the uniform of the Hon. East India Company but the white faces are protected from the deadly shafts of the fiery sun by the immense solar toupées worn by the Englishmen. The heat-haze lay over all, a thick, yellowish glare rendered nearly opaque by the dust-cloud which filled the air, obscuring the landscape for the time as effectually as the mixture of sulphur, soot, and moisture which darkens the atmosphere of London in November.

In the cluster of bamboo huts beyond the north wall of the tomb, there was neither sound nor movement. The stillness of death lay over them. Even the village mongrels had ceased to bark, and lain down to forget in the blessed effacement of sleep, the blows and oaths which were their waking portion. There was nothing moving on the broad bosom of the visible earth. The great globe seemed to have been suddenly emptied of life, to have gone suddenly silent, to have been converted into a gigantic funeral pyre, and to be covered with a vast yellow pall which enveloped all things in its stifling embrace.

Presently one of the stooping figures shifts its position, bringing life and motion into the picture, and lending human interest to the scene. Then both rise together, and stand looking down dubiously at the black figure lying there between them on the ground.

"Can't half make it out, Doctor, can you?" says one.

"Can't make it out at all, my boy," says the other. "The man had no excuse for dying, has no business to be dead, ought really to be as much alive at this very moment as you and me. It's the most confoundedly puzzling professional problem that I've ever been called upon to consider. Jumal Khan has not only defrauded the Company of the valuable services of an able-bodied sepoy, but, by choosing such a very inopportune moment, has practically deserted his post with arms in his hands."

"He was found dead by the havildar this morning, Doctor, when that officer went round to relieve guard."

"That's the 'head and front of his offending,'" said the Doctor. "The man had no business to do it. He had no valid excuse for leaving the service in such an abrupt and irregular fashion. It's a bad example to set the others."

The other man shrugged his shoulders, and the Doctor bent again over the prostrate form of Jumal Khan. He was dissatisfied with the negative results of his hasty examination. Lifting first one eyelid and then another, he looked long and questioningly into the sightless orbs of the dead sepoy. Whatever clue he may have hoped to find there failed to reward him, for he rose with a half-mortified expression on his face and a muttered exclamation on his lips.

"Nothing," he said, as he drew back a pace, "nothing whatever to account for it." Then, turning to his companion, Lieutenant Ash: "The man's dead," he said, "and that's all I can say about it."

"Then I'd better give orders for the burial," said the Lieutenant.

"In the name of Allah, the all-merciful," rejoined the surgeon, "Jumal was a son of the Prophet," and he pointed to the beads which appeared in a fold of the dead man's girdle.

Digitized by Google

"The body's been lying here since daybreak," continued the Lieutenant. "The men wouldn't touch it till they sent for me, and I had to send for you. Fortunately the branches of the peepul have screened it from the sun."

The Englishmen walked slowly towards the white domed building, which was the most conspicuous feature in the dreary landscape, followed at a respectful distance by the three dark figures who had been silently watching the proceedings of the sahibs.

"Ajáib! God is great!" piously ejaculated Ismail Jemadar, on hearing from the mouth of the white men's physician—otherwise Edward Martin, regimental surgeon to the First Battalion of the Bengal Fusiliers—the plain, blunt story that Sepoy Jumal Khan had died for no reason at all that medical science could discover.

"'By visitation of God,' we'll call it this time," said the surgeon, adding, however, that it would probably be as well for the Jemadar not to lose too many of his men in a manner that was not recognised by the official authority at Agra.

"It won't help your promotion, Jemadar," interjected Lieutenant Ash. "The colonel-sahib will not be best pleased with the report I shall have to make him."

Ismail Jemadar salaamed till his forehead touched the ground.

"The will of Allah be done!" he murmured with pious fervour. "God is great—there is none greater. Let not man seek to contend with the Infinite!"

He was found dead

"Unexceptional sentiments," said the Doctor as they got into the buggy in which they had driven out from Agra. "The abstract wisdom of these people, my boy, approaches the sublime; but their practical intelligence is, unfortunately, somewhat defective. The key that will probably unlock the mystery of your man's decease, Bertie, is most likely to be found—there."

As he spoke the surgeon pointed across to the silent collection of bamboo huts looming out indistinctly through the shimmering yellow mist.

"Whew! ain't it hot!" exclaimed the youthful lieutenant, for whom personal questions had a more abiding interest than Asiatic mysteries.

II.

Six a.m. The yellow light of an Indian morning was streaming through the bamboo chinks. The English mail was to leave at sunset, and Edward Martin, M.D., was seated at his writing-table reading over the draft report of a "curious case" which he was communicating to a medical journal in London.

". . . The men were sepoys," ran the Doctor's statement, "stationed temporarily at a police post a few miles outside Agra. They were found dead under circumstances of such a singular character that, believing the story will be perused with interest by a large circle of your subscribers, I am sending you a full account of the incident, perhaps the most extraordinary which I have met with in the course of a long professional experience, together with a detailed report of the pathological examination of the second victim.

"Both men would seem to have died in a similar manner, and from a like predisposing cause, each of the bodies presenting precisely the same appearance to casual observation. Whether there were really any points of difference between the two I am unable to say, as that of the first victim only underwent an ordinary examination.

"In the second case the body was subjected to strict examination. Nothing was discovered, however, that would differentiate the one from the other, or that could be legitimately assigned as the actual cause of death.

"In each case the man was on sentry duty, his beat terminating at a peepul tree about thirty yards from the guard-house; and also, in each case, the body has been found beneath this tree, under which, as I have learnt, the sentry was instructed to remain for at least one minute before resuming his march. Death occurred between midnight and daybreak.

"The post is in charge of a native subaltern, who is visited daily by an officer from Agra. It has only been occupied since the 10th inst.—that is, for little more than a fortnight, yet in that time there have been two men reported dead under circumstances which up to date of writing have baffled all attempts to find a satisfactory explanation.

"There is a village close by, and I am——"

At this point the reading was interrupted by a sharp peremptory rap at the Doctor's door, followed immediately by the inquiry: "You there, Doctor?" in the excited tones of a man in a hurry.

"Come in, Colonel, come in!" cried the medico, who had recognised in a moment the owner of the voice.

"I say, Martin," burst out the Colonel, sweeping up to the table like a south-west monsoon, "this is a pretty state of things! Ash has just been in to report another man dead at Pali."

Digitized by Google

"You don't mean that?" said the surgeon, regarding the Colonel keenly. "I'm just sending off——"

"For goodness sake, Doctor," exclaimed the commanding officer, glancing suspiciously at the sheets of blue letter paper on the Doctor's table, "don't send off anything! Do nothing that will bring the Calcutta people down upon us before we're ready for them. We shall have a waggon load of papers sent in for us to fill up over this job; but we don't want them here till we've got a firm back to the story. Ash has brought in a tale which certainly supports your theory."

"I must go over at once," said the Doctor, jumping up quickly and throwing aside the sheets on which he had been engaged. He didn't stop to explain that his report was written for a newspaper in London, and not for the Army Medical Department at Calcutta. He thought that he might, probably, have something to add to it before it went.

"Everything, as I told you, Colonel," he went on, opening a drawer in his desk, and taking therefrom some diminutive object which he slipped into his pocket, "depends on my seeing the body as soon after death as possible. The suspicions I entertained in the first case were strengthened in the second; and the opinion I was inclined to was confirmed by a conversation I had subsequently with the Chowkidar (village watchman). But before committing myself to a definite statement I must find what I've been looking for, and unless I can see the body before rigor mortis has set in, all mere theorising is a waste of labour."

They were outside by this time. At the door the Colonel's buggy, with the champion trotter of the district between the shafts, was waiting for them.

"Good of you, Colonel," said the Doctor, throwing a look full of gratitude at his companion, "Dewdrop will take us there in twenty minutes."

"I'll back her to do the distance—over three miles, isn't it?—inside of fifteen. We ought to be there by six-thirty. How'll that do?"

"Not a moment too soon, but a lot better than half-past eight, which was the time of arriving on the last occasion," replied the Doctor, as the Colonel gathered up the reins and the mare went away. "I left instructions with the Jemadar on that occasion that if this thing happened again, he was to send in a man to report immediately. I suppose he wouldn't get in till after five?"

"Ash brought him round to my place at five-twenty; so the fellow hadn't lost much time. But I'd gone over to see Cotton, where Ash found me. The men it seems are all scared out of their wits—just quaking with fear. If they had white faces instead of black, I should call it funk. The tree's haunted by a vampire, is the pretty story my lieutenant's got hold of, and the men are in mortal terror. He has a notion the villagers would like to see the post removed."

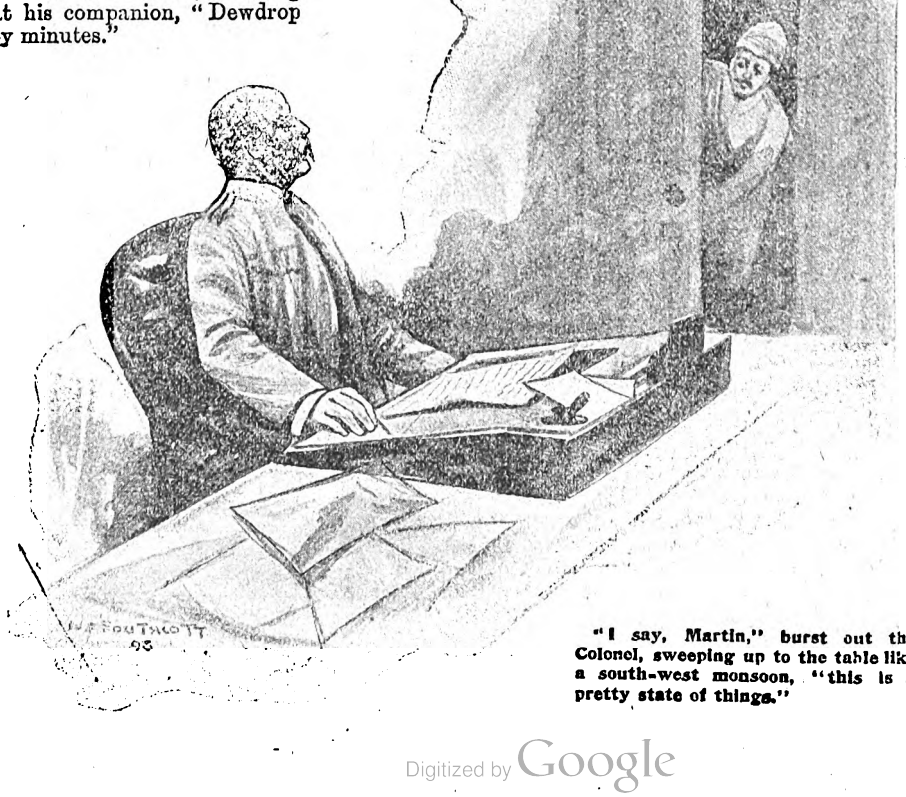
"The tree's got an evil reputation undoubtedly," said the Doctor, "that much I gathered from the talk I had with the Chowkidar; but a vampire, Colonel?—no, there's no vampire in this story, thank you. Vampires suck blood, and no blood had been taken from either of the bodies which I saw. I don't think the villagers care a pice whether the men stay or go. They're a quiet, inoffensive lot, whose only desire is to be let alone. They've no grudge against the police that I can discover; but they seem impressed with the belief that there's something uncanny about the peepul tree."

"You don't think they've put the story about?"

"No, I think the story, whatever it is, belongs to the tree, has grown up with it or, round it, and has become part of its history. I don't think the villagers have either invented it or circulated it. My bearer, who's been doing a little ferreting there on my account, tells me they won't speak about the tree until asked, and always avoid going near it themselves after dark. Certainly I had to use all my persuasive powers and rub a little oil on his palm before I could get Gitan the old Chowkidar to open his mouth; and then he didn't tell half a tale——hardly that."

"Hindoos aren't they?" queried the Colonel.

"Yes," from the Doctor.



"I say, Martin," burst out the Colonel, sweeping up to the table like a south-west monsoon, "this is a pretty state of things."

Digitized by Google

"And our fellows are all sons of the Prophet. Ash was saying he thought the Malgoozar (headman) was perhaps scandalised at our turning the tomb into a guard-house. But the tomb's Mahomedan; so that can't apply. Hindoo prejudice is in no way offended by the occupation."

"Lieutenant Ash is no doubt a very zealous young officer, Colonel; but his knowledge of the country will improve on further acquaintance. What the Malgoozar probably said, was that the Hadji's tomb was built on the site of an old Hindoo temple sacred to Kali. That much I got from the watchman."

The Colonel pointed with his whip to a number of black specks in the sapphire sky. They were vultures hastening to an expected feast.

"Early birds," he murmured.

"Yes," assented the Doctor. "Wheresoever the body is there will the eagles be gathered together. Yonder's our goal, Colonel."

III.

Again, there were two white faces bending eagerly over a black one.

It was the third time that scene had been enacted under the high branches of the tall peepul tree. Again, there was a little group of silent watchers standing a short distance away—afraid to come nearer, afraid of touching that dumb, inanimate object, which a few hours before had been a man in the full enjoyment of lusty life.

"Do you see anything, Doctor?" asked the Colonel impatiently. The Doctor had been searching the dead man's eyes for several minutes with a powerful pocket lens. He did not at once answer the question. His whole attention was absorbed by the nature of his occupation. It was proving intensely interesting.

The Colonel gathered up the reins, and the mare went away.

"What is it you see, Martin?" broke out the Colonel, noting the strange look on the Doctor's face, and growing more excited as the examination proceeded.

But the surgeon paid no heed to the Colonel's interrogations, and the examinations became prolonged.

"Got it!" exclaimed the Doctor at last, in the tone in which a man announces his success at a shooting match.

In his excitement, the Colonel could not refrain from laying his hand on the Doctor's arm. "Yes! What——?"

"H'm," murmured the medico.

"I'm afraid————ssh! gone!!" he cried savagely, glaring angrily at the Colonel.

"What——what is it?" stuttered the innocent offender.

It took Edward Martin, M.D., full five minutes to recover his temper.

"We can do no good by staying with this any longer," he said presently, moving off. "I've not got all I wanted, Colonel; but I've got all I'm ever likely to get—enough to enable me to put on record a definite opinion; more, I expect, than I can hope to make clear to the lay mind. But before saying anything I want first to go down to the village and have a bit o' talk with the Chow-kidar and the Malgoozar."

The Colonel stumped along by the Doctor's side, mute and mortified. He felt that somehow he had put his foot in it, and that silence best became his dignity. This was a doctor's matter. Responsibility lay with Martin. It was for him then, to take the initiative. It was a question of pathology or psychology, or some other "ology" that sounded equally well, but had no connection with regimental routine or military duty. When the M.D. made his report would be the time for the Colonel to take over the business and decide upon his duty to the Company.

The interview with the village officials proved an interminable business.

The men were evidently afraid of speaking—afraid of saying anything which they thought the sahibs would not like to hear—afraid of bringing down upon themselves the malignant power which they believed resided in the peepul tree.

Reduced by the Doctor to the lowest intelligible minimum, their contribution to the story went no further than this. A temple dedicated to Kali had formerly stood on the site of the Hadji's tomb—long ages ago it seemed, since its existence has been a tradition for generations. After the demolition of the temple—there was a choice variety of versions of this story to choose from—the idol was removed to the grove; and was set up according to the village chronicles, under the peepul tree which had been unluckily fixed upon as the boundary of the sepoy sentry's beat.

About the time of the birth of the present Chowkidar—that is to say some sixty years back—the image was carried off to Gola by a high priest of Kali who came from Benares. This worthy it would seem cursed with the curse of Kali, all and sundry who should hereafter defile the place where the holy altar had been set up and the sacred mysteries performed.

It was a fact known to all the village that men who had had the temerity to sleep under the peepul tree in the daytime had been smitten with leprosy or the black plague. Men who had lain down to rest there at night had been found dead in the morning.

The Malgoozar knew what would happen when he saw the sentry under the tree; and he couldn't understand how it was that Kali had not claimed a victim every night instead of only every week. He was afraid to speak, because he knew the sahibs did not worship the old gods and he feared their anger.

A demon lived in the tree, who was a servant of

Digitized by Google

Mahadeva the destroyer, and it was not safe for any man to rest under its shadow. This was the native story.

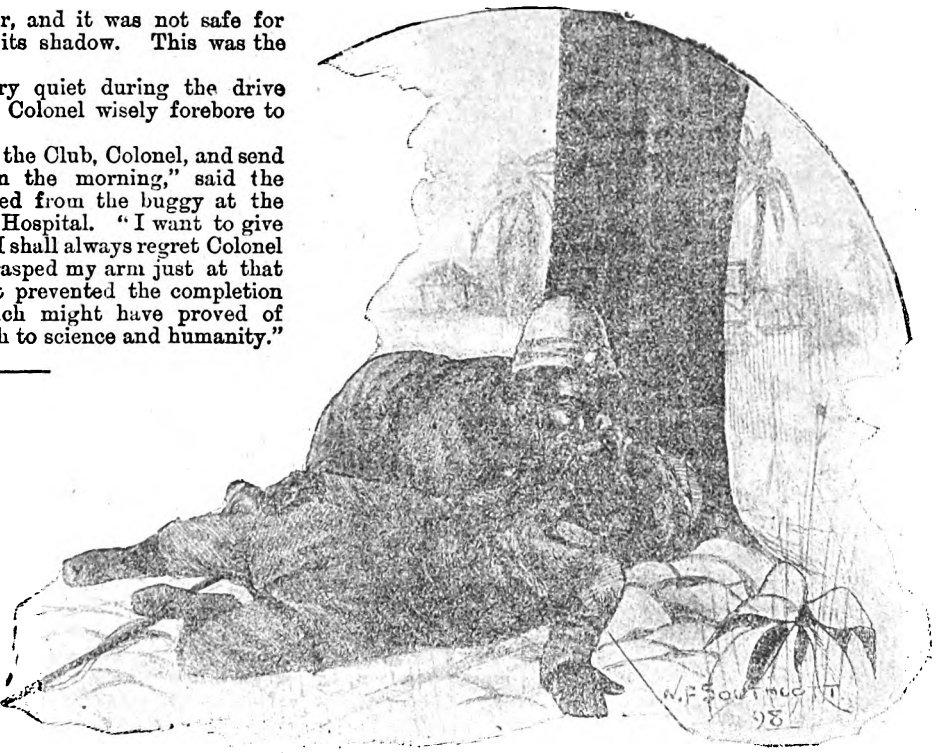
The Doctor was very quiet during the drive back to Agra, and the Colonel wisely forebore to ask questions.

"See you to-night at the Club, Colonel, and send in my official report in the morning," said the surgeon as he descended from the buggy at the doors of the European Hospital. "I want to give my nerves a rest. But I shall always regret Colonel that you should have grasped my arm just at that particular moment. It prevented the completion of an observation which might have proved of incalculable benefit both to science and humanity."

IV.

"THEN you think the man actually saw something?"

Doctor Martin had been addressing a select audience of three in the smoking-room of the English Club—three intensely interested listeners; the Colonel of the Sepoy regiment, the Adjutant, and Lieutenant Ash who commanded the detachment in temporary charge of the Police Post. It was the Adjutant who had asked the question.



Searching the dead man's eyes with a powerful pocket lens

"I am certain that he saw something," replied the surgeon. "Death in each instance was the result of fright. I suspected it in the first case. I detected what I thought were unmistakable signs in the second. But in the case of Azim Khan, not only were the signs clear and palpable, the terror being plainly manifest in the eyes four hours after death; but on each retina there was an impression, not very distinct, but obvious enough to a trained observer using a powerful glass.

"An impression of what? I had been carefully scrutinising the eyes, looking for it, before I caught it. It was stronger in the right eye than in the left, where it only appeared as a dark blurr without definite shape and was fading fast. On the retina of the right eye, however, the outline of one half of what may perhaps have been a head could faintly be traced; but the lower part was hidden by a limb which had been thrust before it—a limb which undoubtedly ended in claws, only three of which I had been able to make out, when the Colonel, without knowledge of the consequence, suddenly seized hold of my arm. The focus was thereby lost. I had been at great pains to find it, and before it could be recovered the impression had faded so far as to be useless.

"The jemadar, as you are aware, Colonel, has spoken to having seen the branches of the peepul agitated in the daytime, when there was not a breath stirring to account for the movement. They have been pushed aside, he says, as if to admit the passage of some animal through them, and have then sprung back again. But he never saw anything. Of course, Colonel, you cannot take account of village tales and native superstitions; but neither can you go on losing men in this way every week. Whatever the latent cause, the men die from active fright. That much is certain—as it is that, the peepul tree is a connecting link between the cause and the effect. Cut down the tree——" "and double the guard," put in the Adjutant.

"Good, sound, practical advice," said the Colonel, relieved at finding himself breathing the air of common sense, after inhaling so much mystery.

* * * * *

Before another forty-eight hours had gone by, the peepul tree was level with the ground. Lieutenant Ash had posted two men on guard, and was himself on duty at the tomb.

A week passed, and then a month. At the end of that time the guard was reduced.

The story of the haunted peepul tree had become almost as legendary as the tradition of the temple of Kali and the demon of Mahadeva.

Digitized by Google

THE GOVERNOR'S NIECE.

A Story of West Africa.

By GERTRUDE PAGE.

Author of "Flat F. and Flat G.," "For a Woman's Kiss," etc.

Nessie Powell stood in the window of her aunt's drawing-room and looked across Hyde Park. She stood with her hands behind her, and her brow was puckered, and her eyes wore a far away expression; it was evident she noted nothing of the panorama passing before her.

Her aunt sat working at a little distance, and now and then she raised her eyes and glanced at the slim figure in the window. She was the wife of the Governor of Accra, and had been trying to persuade her niece to accompany her to the coast, to stay a month and then return with him when he came home on leave.

Nessie was a little afraid of the sea and hesitated.

"You will like it after the first few days," said Lady Mannering presently, "and it will do you so much good. You have been looking very poorly lately."

Nessie did not reply but went on weighing the question.

She was thinking how delightful it would be, when once there, to have broken away from certain old associations and memories, and perhaps make a fresh start without that perpetual longing at her heart.

Three months ago, Dick Pontin of the Lagos Secretariat, had concluded his leave in England and gone back to the coast; at the beginning of his holiday he had seen a great deal of Nessie, and they had soon become special friends, and then suddenly he had studiously avoided her. It had come like a shock, for she could not explain the change; she only knew that the season had lost all its charm for her, and the gaieties become mockery.

Two months afterwards she was told that he was engaged and her heart was very sore. She tried at first to be hard about it and persuade herself that she didn't care. She said he was evidently very fickle and not worth fretting about. She told herself she had had a fortunate escape.

But all the same she could not forget his steady grey eyes and manly bearing, which emphatically gave the lie to her charge of fickleness, and so she decided she had imagined too much and he had in reality been only just friendly with her.

She then faced her trouble bravely and prepared to make herself forget, but it was hard work and other things than late hours took the roses from her cheeks and the lightness from her step. Had there been any fear of meeting him on the coast, she would have declined at once, but she knew there was not the smallest likelihood of it, as Lagos was a long way from Accra, and he would not be returning home for some months.

So at last she turned her back to the window and came into the room.

"I think I'll go, auntie," she said simply.

Lady Mannering looked up with a pleased expression.

"That's right," she said. "You'll be certain to enjoy yourself when you've got the sea-sickness over," and she rose and put aside her work, saying she would begin to make arrangements at once, and must write some letters.

She was a tall, stately woman, with splendid dark eyes and massive coils of thick dark hair, but her mouth was hard, and one felt that she would be a difficult woman to withstand, if she made up her mind about anything. Without exactly letting it be apparent, she always had her own way, and what she attempted she usually achieved.

Nessie Powell was her favourite niece, and she liked her none the less because she was one of the few who dare occasionally go against her. At the same time she practically ruled the girl, but was careful never to let her know of it. Of Dick Pontin she had disapproved from the first, on account of his prospects, and in many little ways she had contrived to come between them. When she heard casually that he was engaged, she lost no time in telling the news to Nessie. Her idea now, was to marry her niece to her friend Captain Welbeck; and being a woman with nothing particular to do, she was not above scheming to carry out her plan.

Captain Welbeck had told her he was starting for West Africa shortly, and as she had long talked of going herself, she decided to do so now and take Nessie Powell with her. She felt the change of life and scene would do the girl good, and help her to get over her disappointment quickly, and she saw no harm in quietly ascertaining Captain Welbeck's ship and taking their passages in the same.

They arrived at Liverpool over night as the boat started early, and stayed at a hotel. In the morning, as Nessie was ready first, she stood by the large fire in the hall, warming her feet and amusing herself by watching the various people bustling about.

Digitized by Google

Presently a tall man, with a grey moustache and military bearing, came and stood by the fire also and Nessie coloured slightly, as she became aware that he was quietly scrutinising her from head to foot. At last she turned her head and looked straight into his eyes with a quick, fearless, half-defiant glance. He returned it a moment, then looked quietly away, but did not offer to move.

Nessie was just about to go, when her aunt came into the hall, and instantly advanced with outstretched hand and a surprised face towards them.

"How do you do, Captain Welbeck?" she exclaimed. "How strange that we should meet you here. Let me introduce you to my niece," and she turned to Nessie.

"I know Miss Powell very well by sight," he replied, with a gravely polite bow, "and I am delighted to make her acquaintance, though I wish it had been any time but the present."

Nessie looked slightly amused while her aunt remarked. "Why, how is that?"

He was quietly scrutinising her from head to foot.

"Because I am just embarking for West Africa, and I shall not be able to make use of my introductions for six months."

"Africa," exclaimed Lady Mannering, "surely not in the Roquelle?"

"That is my ship, why——surely——" and his eyes suddenly lit up, though his face remained unmoved, "surely you are not going out?" he concluded.

"Yes, we are going to my husband for a few weeks," said Lady Mannering.

"Then I am indeed fortunate," and he looked hard at Nessie.

Nessie looked away hurriedly, for something in his glance made her shiver a little, and she felt sure she should not like him.

But when, after five miserable days below deck, she made her appearance looking white and wretched, he proved so considerate and sympathetic, that her sudden aversion vanished somewhat. He placed a deck chair for her in a shaded nook and then, for over an hour, entertained her with anecdotes and adventures, while her aunt read a little way off.

And Nessie listened gladly, for she had been hopelessly wretched below deck, and was glad of anything that took her thoughts from herself.

By evening she had cheered up wonderfully, and Lady Mannering looked on contentedly while they paced the deck together, and admired the beautiful hues of the setting sun.

"I will show you my photographs to-morrow," he said to her as they were saying "good-night." "I want your opinion upon some of them."

Nessie laughed a little uneasily, "I don't know anything about photographs," she said.

"I think you will know sufficient to make your opinion valuable to me," he replied rather pointedly, looking hard at her; and again she was conscious of that little shivery feeling.

At the beginning of the third and last week of the journey, it was generally recognised among the few passengers on the ship, that Captain Welbeck's attentions to Miss Powell were not only marked, but genuine, and they waited with idle curiosity for the final move.

Nessie began to realise it also, and she began to feel too that somehow she was in his power. His manner to her had a certain air of possession about it, and a marked assurance. Sometimes when she was off-hand with him, she saw him set his lips tightly, while a gleam of determination shone in his eyes, and without exactly feeling afraid of him, she felt helpless to resist him. She felt that, if their wills clashed, hers would go down before his like a leaf.

And being a healthy, independent English girl, she resented the feeling strongly and made strenuous efforts to break away from his influence. Again and again she almost succeeded, and again and again she was reconquered.

Meanwhile Lady Mannering made no mention of the subject. While Captain Welbeck monopolised Nessie, she would pace the deck with her usual stately air and converse on the many subjects of which she was a complete master, with such of the passengers as happened to please her. Apparently she was quite unconscious of what was going on, and never appeared to throw them in each other's way. It was two days before they reached Accra that the climax came.

Nessie was standing looking idly across the blue waste of waters, and there was a shadow in her clear

Digitized by Google

'No, no . . . it cannot be."

eyes, and a little droop about her mouth. She had resolutely put her sorrow away and as resolutely strove to forget it. She had buried it deep down in her heart and tried to trample its grave out of sight, but sometimes, as with all our hidden graves, the buried past rose up and shut the sunlight from the present. Nessie looked across the blue waters with steady eyes but a weight like lead pressed down on her, and a dreary sense of loneliness.

"You look thoughtful, Miss Powell," said a well-known voice to her.

She smiled slowly but did not turn. Instead she leant her arms on the rail and looked down into the water.

"I believe I was dreaming," she said simply.

He leant beside her and his arm touched hers. A nervous sensation passed over her, but she felt as if she could not move.

And presently she found herself gazing steadily down into the water, while he told her in measured tones of his love, and asked her to be his wife. When he ceased speaking they were both silent for some moments, then she looked up suddenly.

"No, no," she said hurriedly, as if afraid of herself "it cannot be, I don't love you."

She was conscious that his lips tightened and his brow lowered a little, but he only said quietly. "Perhaps you have not thought it over fairly. I can offer you every advantage in the way of money and position, and I am sincerely in love with you. I was first attracted to you at Lady Nevill's ball three months ago, but could not get an introduction to you. Will you do me the honour to consider what I have told you?"

"I feel sure it is unnecessary," she stammered, changing colour. "I do not think I am likely to change my mind."

"At any rate I may speak to you again, mayn't I? Let me take your answer to-morrow instead of this evening."

She glanced towards him and the pain in her heart gripped her.

He was strong and manly and kind, and she—she was tired and lonely, for the sweetness had gone out of everything, and she had not lived long enough to know how soon the sun would shine brightly again.

She thought it would be nice to be taken care of and not feel so lonely, and then that old sense of helplessness came over her again.

"Shall we leave it till to-morrow?" he reiterated; and she assented.

The next morning her aunt alluded to the subject for the first time, and seeing her niece's indecision, brought all her influence to bear on her. In a careful, collected way she talked down all her scruples and virtually settled the question for her.

When the Roquelle reached Accra the following day, Nessie was formally engaged to Captain Welbeck.

He was going on to Lagos, but had time to go ashore with them in the surf boat. His care and consideration for Nessie were unbounded, but all the time she was conscious of his iron determination and a little afraid of him. She did not feel free to speak and act as she liked, and the restraint rather fretted her. Still, his manner was kindness itself, so she laughed down her fears, and before he left them, he persuaded her, with Lady Mannering's help, to be married at Accra in six weeks' time, and remain on the coast with him until he returned to England.

Later on in the evening, Nessie stood on the verandah of the Governor's castle alone, and looked thoughtfully into the glorious African night. The castle was built close on to the sea, and the moonlight on the waters and on the palm trees and bananas ma e a beautiful, half-mystical scene. Now and then the stillness was broken by the noise of the tom-toms and uncouth singing, or by the laughter of a merry band of young Englishmen, returning to their quarters after an evening's jollity; but otherwise silence and peacefulness reigned.

Lady Mannering was engaged with her husband and one or two friends of his, and Nessie had been glad to have the opportunity of slipping away unnoticed.

Suddenly a quick footstep sounded on the verandah, hesitated a moment, then hurried towards her.

"Miss Powell," said a voice eagerly, and all the colour went out of Nessie's face, while the landscape became an indistinct blur.

Digitized by Google

She turned slowly and stood face to face with Dick Pontin.

"I'm so awfully glad to see you," he continued in the same eager voice. "How are you? I had to go up country or I should have been here to receive you, as I have been staying at the castle lately. I have only just returned and had to fly into my dress clothes, for fear you would have gone to bed. How are you? You look cold. Shall I fetch you a wrap?"

"Thanks, I'm not at all cold," she replied, but she shivered and went if possible whiter, "I'm very pleased to see you."

"You look as if you had seen a ghost," he laughed. "Did I startle you?"

With a tremendous effort Nessie drew herself together.

"You certainly surprised me," she said with an attempt at lightness. "I had no idea you were in Accra."

"Didn't you know I had been promoted?" he asked with a gleam in his eyes, "I have got poor Nevill's berth. He died of fever you know, two months ago, and through your uncle's influence I took his place. I have been acting as secretary to your uncle for a week, as Hedley has fever, and that is why I am staying here, but I am afraid I go to-morrow.

"I hope we shall see a great deal of each other. I could hardly believe my ears when he told me you were coming out with Lady Mannering."

Nessie turned away. She had an odd feeling that if she didn't scream out or something, her head would burst. Instead she gripped the verandah rail until her knuckles stood out.

He noticed her constrained manner, and set it down to his sudden breaking off of their friendship in Eng'and.

"Did you have a good passage?" he asked, determined not to be repulsed, but to make the most of his opportunity. He had thought of little else but seeing her again, since he got his promotion. It had not occurred to him that his conduct in London could cause an actual breach between them. It was all so clear to him, that he imagined it was to her also. He did not know much about girls, having had little to do with them. He was so conscious of his own love for her, that he supposed she knew about it too, and would understand why he had acted as he had. He had never ceased loving her for a moment since he set eyes on her; there did not seem to him to be any need for preliminaries, or any reason why they should not go on just where they left off, with the only difference that he was now in a position to show his love.

"Yes very good," she replied to his question, without meeting his eyes. "I enjoyed it very much when I got over the sea-sickness."

"What do you think of Accra?" and he leant against a pillar beside her, taking in every line of her face and form with ill-concealed eagerness.

"I think it is interesting," she replied. "I am looking forward to exploring the neighbourhood. I suppose it is perfectly safe to go about alone?"

"Oh yes, but you might get lost and find it difficult to make yourself understood. I am not very busy just now, if you will allow me to be your escort sometimes, I should be only too glad."

Nessie bit her lips.

"Thank you," she replied constrainedly, "but I daresay my uncle will arrange for Lady Mannering and me to be shown round."

He looked surprised and pained, and for a few moments they were both silent. Her changed manner puzzled him, but being very straight by nature, he decided to come to the point at once, and not risk a misunderstanding.

"I hope you are not vexed with me about anything, Miss Powell," he began, standing upright beside her. "I know I may have seemed to behave rather strangely in London last spring, but I couldn't help myself. If you only knew what it cost me! I had no position then worth speaking of, and no prospects. As it is, I owe my present good fortune to having been able to serve your uncle in an unlooked for way.

"I was obliged to run away from you, I couldn't trust myself, but now——"

"Oh, hush——" she gasped and clutched tighter at the rail.

It was Dick's turn to go white now as he asked anxiously. "What is it? What have I said?"

"Oh, nothing," and she laughed fitfully. "It only sounds rather odd. I was told you got engaged before you left England."

"I got engaged——" in incredulous tones.

"Yes, I heard it from one or two quarters."

"What rubbish," and he flushed and looked annoyed. "I should have thought you would have known better than to believe it," with emphasis.

"How should I?" she asked with an attempt at lightness. "I am rather sorry; I was going to congratulate you nicely."

She turned slowly and stood face to face with Dick Pontin.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I'm glad it's not necessary," and he looked perplexed. "But it is a good thing you mentioned it. We shall understand each other better now. I am hoping we can have some of those jolly times again like we had in England. Do you remember Henley and the Jubilee and the Derby? What times they were; I have often lived them all through again out here," and his eyes shone, "I'd like to take you to see the new golf links if you'll come. Will you?"

"I don't know whether I can manage it. I must see what Lady Mannering says."

He looked at her anxiously.

"You are so different somehow," he said. "What is it? I have pictured this meeting over and over again, since I heard you were coming, and now——" he paused.

She was looking out to sea with straining eyes and set lips.

"What is it?" he asked, with boyish peremptoriness.

She turned and looked into his face, and her own was haggard in spite of her efforts.

"I am engaged," she said slowly, "and going to be married almost immediately."

II.

"WHAT on earth's the matter with Pontin?"

The speaker was lounging in a hammock chair on a verandah, with his feet on the top rail. As he spoke, he carelessly knocked the end off his cigar and shifted his position a little in the listless fashion of the coast.

"Goodness knows, but he's jolly dicky," replied his companion, who was lounging in much the same fashion, only with his feet on a table.

The first speaker, Captain Drew, took a long whiff at his cigar, blew the smoke into rings, and finally remarked questioningly:

"Think it's Miss Powell?"

"Don't see how it can be. She was engaged when she arrived. She must have made short work of him if it is. Lady Mannering informed me of the fact in about ten minutes, as if to warn me off."

"They may have met in England."

Before replying Captain Lascelles took a drink out of the glass beside him, and lit a fresh cigarette.

"Possibly," he said at last, "but I hardly think so. I've never seen him speak to her yet; they don't take the faintest notice of each other."

"That's just what looks queer," replied Captain Drew. "Why the deuce don't they?"

"Quarrelled, perhaps."

"Not they. Pontin's not the chap to quarrel. There isn't a better fellow on the coast. I hate to see him looking as he does. Last night in the middle of the evening I saw him go out on to the verandah by himself. They made him sing and recite, you know. Wouldn't let him off. And when he'd done sending them into fits of laughter, he just went outside alone, and leant against a pillar. It upset me, and that's saying a good deal. I can stand a fair amount naturally, after seeing one's pals go home and die, as they do in this beastly place; but I can't stand seeing a chap play the fool with the look in his eyes that Pontin has."

"Sure to be a girl at the bottom of it, poor devil," said Captain Lascelles philosophically.

"Then if it's a girl who can play any tricks on a chap like Pontin, all I can say is, she wants smothering." And Alec Drew got up and shook himself with an energy quite surprising.

Lascelles smoked on lazily.

"Miss Powell wouldn't," he said presently.

"Good afternoon, Miss Powell."

"No, I don't think she would," replied Drew. "She's one of the best, and that's just why it's so deuced odd, because I can't help thinking she's in it somehow."

Just then they heard the wheels of a go-cart, and a moment later Dick Pontin himself rode up to the bungalow steps.

"What ho!" called Drew, and advanced to meet him. "Glad to see you, old chap."

Pontin gave some directions to his boys, and went up the steps with outstretched hands.

"I'm off to-morrow," he said. "Thought I'd just come round and say a good-bye. Hullo, Lascelles, you here! Thought you'd got fever."

"Sorry to disappoint you, old chap. Come and have a cock-tail."

"Thanks; I'm agreeable," and, with a smile, Pontin planted himself on the rail of the verandah, and leant forward with his arms across his knees, while Drew succumbed once more to his lounge.

"Off to-morrow," he said, when settled to his liking; "what on earth do you mean?"

"I've got Mannering to send me up-country."

"What the dickens for?" put in Lascelles.

Pontin shrugged his shoulders carelessly.

"A freak," he remarked. "I've persuaded him to let me join the party going up for a palaver with King Que."

Digitized by Google

"Beastly work this time of the year. Rum idea to go just when there's a little life in the place. You'll miss Lady Mannering's ball."

"I'm not keen on dancing," and Pontin watched his cigar smoke carelessly.

"It'll be a swell affair," continued Lascelles. "A sort of formal announcement of Miss Powell's engagement, I hear. Welbeck himself is coming, and I believe they're going to be married a few days afterwards."

Both men watched Pontin narrowly, but he only went on gazing at his cigar end and made no sign.

"Nice girl," said Drew casually. "Too good for Welbeck. Can't stand the man."

"What's wrong with him?" and Pontin looked away from them and flicked a spider from the rail beside him.

"Starchy beggar. A German Emperor sort of a chap. He'll develop into a tyrant if she doesn't mind."

"Got the pull though," put in Lascelles. "The Griffin knew what she was about."

"Who do you mean by the Griffin?" asked Pontin.

"Lady Mannering, to be sure. She's got Miss Powell pretty well under her thumb, anyone can see. In fact, she appears to me to be disposed to boss the whole colony."

Dick swung one foot and said nothing.

"How long shall you be away?" asked Drew.

"Six weeks I should think."

"Then you'll miss the wedding."

"Yes."

"Not keen, eh?"

Dick laughed with an attempt at indifference which, however, did not go down with his friend. "Get quite enough funerals without weddings," he said.

"It makes a little variation," remarked Drew drily, and sat up to mix another cock-tail.

"When do you start?"

"The day after to-morrow."

"Well, don't leave your bones up there. You look pretty seedy."

"No, don't," put in Lascelles good humouredly, "because we can't work that Pierrot entertainment without you."

As Dick Pontin rode home again he met a girlish figure clad all in white, with a large white umbrella. He hesitated a moment, then called to the boys to stop, and alighted.

"Good afternoon, Miss Powell," he said rather gravely. "You are a little rash to be walking at this hour. Will you do me the favour of using my cart?"

"Thank you, but I am only returning home from Colonel Grant's, and it is such a little distance, I prefer to walk. Those things shake you to pieces," and she laughed nervously.

Again Dick hesitated, then said: "May I walk to the castle with you?"

Nessie Powell assented with a sickening feeling, for the strain of the last four weeks was beginning to unnerve her. Ever since that first night they had only met casually, and exchanged the bare civilities of conversation, but this was partly owing to Lady Mannering's vigilant eye. She had no sooner discovered Dick Pontin's presence than she had systematically monopolised Nessie's time. She talked incessantly of the approaching wedding, and would barely trust her out of her sight, while to Dick her manner was coldness itself.

By some mistake he was nearly always left out of the invitation list, and if he met Nessie at another house her aunt was certain to be near enough to prevent anything at all of a confidential conversation.

At first Dick was very indignant, but afterwards he thought it was probably Nessie's wish as well, so he avoided them altogether. But that afternoon, with the unavoidable perils of his up-country journey on his mind, and the consciousness that in all probability he would never see her again, he could not resist a few last words. So he sent the boys on with the cart and paced slowly by her side.

"I want to take this opportunity of offering you my good wishes for your happiness," he began in the same grave manner, "as I shall probably not see you again."

Nessie caught her breath, but remained outwardly calm and collected. "How is that?" she asked.

"I am going up country, and when I come back you will have gone from Accra."

"It is rather dangerous, isn't it?" she said, looking straight before her.

"Not if one is careful and takes proper precautions. Not that that would hinder me," he added with a sudden bitterness; "there are some times when one greets danger as a friend."

Nessie quickened her steps a little.

"I hope you won't run any risks," she said, striving to crush the anxiety from her voice and face.

He was silent.

"You ought to consider your people at home," she continued. "Your sister would almost break her heart if anything happened to you."

"Yes," he said at last, "I must consider Edith. No one else would care much, but I think she would."

"I should care," she said, then drew herself up short.

"Would you?" he asked pointedly, and looked into her face.

"Of course I should," and again she laughed nervously. "I cannot spare any of my friends."

"Is that all?" he asked, and his steady eyes seemed to look through into her soul.

She tried to meet them, but failed, and the words she would say died away upon her lips. He was watching her closely and saw it all.

"God help us both!" he ejaculated in a low voice, and stood still with his hands in his pockets, and gazed out to sea without seeing anything.

"Do you care for Welbeck at all?" he asked suddenly.

"Oh, don't ask me any questions," she said pleadingly. "Don't you know? Can't you see? Let us say good-bye now and get it over. I have taken my path and I am obliged to follow it."

"Do you mean you haven't the courage to own yourself mistaken?"

"No, no, not that! Oh, can't you understand?"

"The only thing I can't understand," he said slowly, "is why you let them ride rough-shod over you and rush this thing through, unless you like it."

"I can't play him false," she breathed in a low voice, "at least you might understand that."

"I will try," he said gravely, and they went on in silence, and parted at the gates.

The day of the ball the whole of Accra was more or less in a state of excitement. Every Englishman in the colony had been invited, and all the leading natives. The latter were almost beside themselves, especially the ladies, for most of them had brand new costumes from England, which they had probably been keeping months for a function grand enough to grace them.

In spite of everything Nessie could not help laughing, after the guests began to arrive, at the incongruities of

Digitized by Google

The ball went forward gaily, and merriment was the order of the hour.

some of the marvellous toilettes. The clothes themselves were all right, but their owners were apparently in a delightful state of ignorance concerning how they should be worn. One gaily-dressed belle wore a feather-boa round her waist, and another a jewelled waist-band round her neck. Several ladies wore two-buttoned kid gloves with short sleeves, while one had decorated her skirt with a chiffon opera cape, panier fashion. Nessie counted three bodices worn hind before, and two sisters came wearing each other's skirts.

Lady Mannering received them all with her usual stately mien, but a careful observer easily detected a shade of anxiety on her face, and she constantly glanced at the door as if watching for someone. The fact was, Captain Welbeck had not yet made his appearance, and she was utterly at a loss to account for it. The ship he was to come in had been signalled in the afternoon, and ought to have arrived by now, giving him ample time to dress, but the minutes ticked on and still there was no sign of him.

Meanwhile, the ball went forward gaily, and merriment was the order of the hour. The Englishmen appeared to be getting unlimited amusement out of their dusky partners, and the dusky partners themselves to be coquetting wildly.

In the middle of the evening Nessie stood apart with Captain Drew, and watched the animated scene. They were on a little balcony, commanding a glorious view of the coast from without and a bird's-eye view of the room from within. After watching the dancers for a little while she turned, and, leaning against a support, looked wistfully out through the night.

Captain Drew pulled a low chair forward and placed it so that she could see the moon on the sea, and then persuaded her to be seated. He thought she looked dreadfully white and ill, and, without quite knowing why, he felt very sorry for her.

Nessie on her part was quite content, for she knew he was Dick's great friend, and somehow with him she did not feel obliged to seem lively. So she sat quite still and looked over the sea, and he sat on a small table beside her, swinging his feet and humming to himself.

"May I smoke?" he asked, and she bent her head in assent.

"Rather odd Captain Welbeck should be so late," he remarked presently in his usual slow, careless fashion.

"Yes," she answered, "I can't understand it at all. I suppose the ship is in?"

"Yes, but she hasn't been in long. Perhaps he's had all his dress shirts stolen, and had to go round borrowing."

Nessie smiled slowly and leant her head back. She did not pretend to be very concerned. She felt too tired to pretend anything.

"I wonder how Pontin's getting on?" he continued presently. "I hope he won't go and be rash. He looked rather as if he might."

"How was that?"

"I don't know, but he hasn't seemed quite himself for the last month. He's down upon his luck about something. Awfully good chap Pontin. Not a lady's man, perhaps, but a trump to the backbone."

"You know him well?"

She carefully avoided meeting his eyes, and half turned her head away.

"Yes. We used to 'dig' together. I suppose as he knew your uncle when he came out here you have met him before?" and he watched her narrowly.

"Yes, I have met him at dances in London," she replied, still looking away.

"I can't help thinking he's awfully cut up about something," continued Captain Drew. "He looks it somehow. Do you think he is?"

"I haven't heard of anything;" but, as she spoke, a flush dyed her cheeks and then faded away, leaving her paler than ever.

"You have never heard his name mentioned in connection with anyone else's, perhaps?"

"I heard he got engaged when he was last in England, but I think it wasn't true after all."

Captain Drew smoked hard for several seconds, with knitted brows, then remarked slowly:

"No, it wasn't true, but it was dashed impudence of whoever started it. It might have caused serious mistakes."

Nessie lowered her eyes to her fan, and for some minutes he watched her in silence. Then he went on irrelevantly:

Digitized by Google

"Women are strange creatures. They're so insanely fond of making martyrs of themselves for a sentiment, or a sensation, or something equally foolish."

She smiled a little.

"You are growing quite philosophical," she said.

"I am a bit of a philosopher in my way," he said. "We all get a bit so on the coast. It's just as well, because we have to put up with a good deal, to say nothing of the amount of funerals we attend. I can't take women philosophically, though. They annoy me when they act with blind foolishness."

"You are rather hard on my poor sex."

"Well, I want to do them good, you see," and he smiled a little. "Now you, for instance, with all due deference, I could easily imagine you going to the stake for a religion or a fad."

"Go on," she said, looking amused.

"Well, of course it's very noble and splendid, and all that; but, at the same time, it's dashed silly."

"It's often the easiest, though."

"In that case then, I should call it want of pluck." And again he watched her narrowly.

She winced slightly, and turned away.

"Perhaps you don't understand," she said slowly. "Men rarely do. They jump to conclusions, and pass judgment on their own side of the question only," and she stood up as if to go.

"Perhaps not," he said, rising also. "It's a queer old world, and mistakes are so easily made and so hardly unmade."

Nessie bit her lips and took a step towards the window, but she was suddenly arrested by his exclaiming:

"Hullo—what's up?"

She looked round, and then they both leant over the balcony together and watched a little group below. A messenger appeared to have come with important news.

"Died of fever yesterday," they heard. "Have come to tell His Excellency."

Nessie gasped and clutched hard at the rail.

"It's Dick," she breathed, in a hoarse voice, going deathly white.

Captain Drew was startled himself, but he read her secret.

"Oh, no, not likely," he said soothingly, "I should think it's probably some news from the ship. I'll go down and see, shall I, and come back here? Sit down while I go," and he led her to the chair again. "Don't be anxious; I'm sure there's no need. It can't be Pontin."

When he returned he found her looking hard before her, with set lips, and she did not move as he approached.

"It is bad news," he said very quietly.

She drew a deep breath, and said mechanically:

"What is it?"

"Dick Pontin died of fever yesterday," he replied. Then he turned his back on her, and leant over the balcony, apparently deeply interested in the people below.

"Dick Pontin died of fever yesterday."

Mr. Jawsmith: "Mrs. J., I am going to buy a pair of scales and have them sent up here to-day."

Mrs. J: "Why on earth do you want scales?"

Mr. J: "I'm determined to have my own weigh in this house."

"Human nature is inherently pessimistic," remarked the man who assumes great wisdom.

"There isn't any proof of that assertion."

"Yes, there is. Nobody ever stops to talk about the weather except when it's disagreeable."

Jack (to his fiancée): "I think of getting a musical instrument, Maud. Say, perhaps, a cornet."

Maud (in dismay): "Oh, no; not that horrid thing."

Jack (in surprise): "And why not, dearest?"

Maud (blushing violently): "It makes the lips so hard.'

Villainous-looking Character: "Wot's ther time, guvnor?"

Mr. Bluff (hitting him over the head): "It's just struck one."

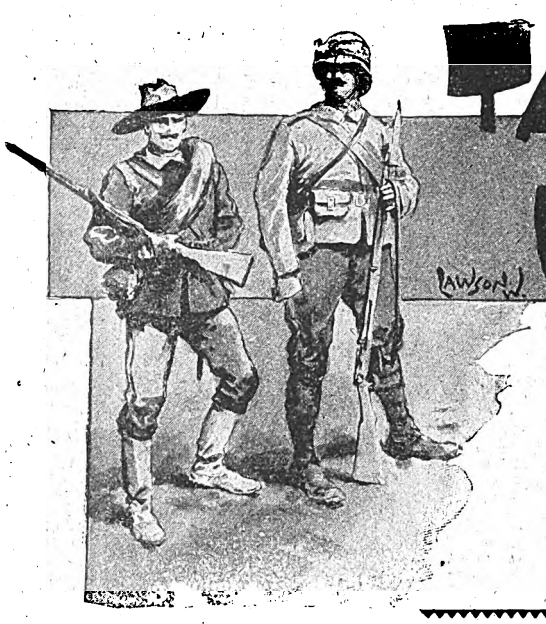
Villainous-looking Character: "I 'ope your watch ain't a repeater."

Owing to the advent of Xmas, the next number of

"Short Stories"

will be on Sale on Saturday, December 24th, instead of the following Tuesday.

Digitized by Google



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"À PARIS!"

SOME weeks elapsed before there was any severe fighting in France, after the tremendous events of June 2nd, 3rd, and 4th, in the environs of Rouen and Yvetot.

The French Government found it increasingly difficult to lay hands upon the subsidiary millions of men who always figure so largely in statistical enumerations of the Continental armies on the war footing. By this time the great mass of the people were utterly sick of a struggle which was clearly destined to bring nothing in its train, save personal loss and national humiliation.

But Paris was still France, and Paris was girding her loins for another siege. The military experts laughed at the idea of the threatened British investment of the fortifications. These, roughly speaking, inclose a ring of 125 miles, and to besiege Paris upon the lines adopted by the Germans in 1870, would require an armed force strong enough to resist sorties at every point of a circle measuring 130 miles along its inner circumference. Although England Canada, South Africa, and Australia had succeeded in lodging nearly a million of men upon French soil, it was obvious that for even this large force there was little hope of a successful attack upon the capital.

The total troops at Lord Roberts' disposal—it must not be forgotten that Sir Redvers Buller's Southern French Expedition would not be available for many weeks, even if entirely successful in the march through France—would barely suffice to encircle Paris with a line of men in double rank. Not, of course, that any such procedure would be necessary or possible, but the simple statement of fact demonstrates how difficult it would be to dispose the beleaguering corps in such manner as would enable them to check a determined assault delivered unexpectedly by the enemy in any definite locality.

Common sense at last began to prevail in the deliberations of the allies' Council of War. It was strongly urged, and not too hotly controverted, that the British army was invincible in the field, and that the most damaging tactics which could be employed against it was for the French to post themselves impregnably behind their ceinture of forts, and allow the English to spend their resources in vain upon the tremendous task of subduing Paris.

General Saussier himself saw the wisdom of this course, and he finally yielded to it, only stipulating that a well equipped army of 100,000 men should lie in the path of th British advance from Rouen, and delay and hamper thei progress in every possible way without engaging in opera tions upon a grand scale.

Above and beyond every other achievement, the duty of this Corps of Observation was to destroy roads and railways as it retired. Meanwhile it had to harass and annoy Lord Roberts to the utmost extent.

The scheme was sound enough in scope, but it counted upon one element which had, so far, been signally absent from the French plan of operations—Lord Roberts had a way of making his own arrangements, and his ideas had never hitherto coincided with those of the French leaders.

So he quietly detailed General Alleyne's division to keep the Observation Corps fully employed some ten miles beyond Rouen, while he personally devoted every energy to the concentration of troops and stores at this centre. Transport was, above all else, imperatively needed in abundance, and when the railway lines in the British rear got beyond the control of the limited staff available in the ranks of the army, the Commander-in-Chief asked the London and North Western Railway Company to take charge of the working arrangements.

Mr. Frederick Harrison, the general manager of that famous company, assumed personal control of this department, thus utilising what he ingeniously described as his "summer holiday," and the result was that trains were now run in France as they had never been run before.

Such was the extraordinary attitude of the people towards the conquerors, that quite a brisk passenger traffic was conducted between Havre, Honfleur, and Rouen, and a well-known provincial lawyer summed up the situation by saying: "The English have indeed beaten us, but at last we have got expresses."

Some weeks passed in active mobilisation before the English Commander-in-Chief felt himself sufficiently prepared to undertake the final rush forward to Paris.

Similar tactics had taken place in Germany, and the smart French papers, in their merciless analysis of events, did not scruple to point the moral for their disconsolate readers.

Thus the GIL BLAS said: "At the beginning of the war of 1870, Parisians cried 'A Berlin!' Ere many weeks had passed the Berliners retorted with roars of 'À Paris!' These English say nothing, but they are coming to both places. However, brave though they be, they will never return. The present generation of Frenchmen have not had time to forget the lessons of the last siege. We have food for years. Our forts are impregnable. We will dance behind our fortifications whilst our enemies die of sheer exhaustion."

Digitized by Google

Alleyne's division lay on the pleasant slopes of the south side of the Seine, with its centre in the quaint village of Pont de l'Arche. Two miles away were the French outposts, and for many days there had been warm but brief passages between the belligerents.

The Commander-in-Chief had ascertained that the country between this point and Paris was absolutely denuded of troops, and, what was more important, he knew that the railway was not yet destroyed, as the French naturally found it of the utmost convenience in supplying food, ammunition, and reinforcements to their fighting-line. But the French Commander, Général de Valois, deeming himself strong enough to retire in good order before an attack in force by the British, had made complete dispositions for blowing up bridges and embankments and derailing the lines at his convenience. He rested secure in the belief that no unforeseen circumstance could prevent the fulfilment of his mission. Any flanking movement by his opponents could not hinder the accomplishment of this portion of his duties, and a direct attack could not be so rapid as to interfere with his calculations.

Lord Roberts thought that it could.

On the night of July 5th—a day passed with less than ordinary excitement at the front—two fine columns, of 10,000 men in each, were drawn up a mile behind the British pickets.

They were led respectively by Brigadier-Generals Sir Frederick Carrington and F. J. Caldecott, and their object was to march, by parallel roads about a mile apart, right through the centre of the French position, and not to halt until they had reached Gaillon, a point eight miles in rear of the French lines.

Fighting, of course, they would have their fill of, but at any cost they must persevere in their advance, and thus act as a human wedge driven through the enemy, and leaving him open to be attacked and beaten in detail at dawn by the troops already en route from Rouen for that purpose.

There was no moon, and heavy clouds not only threatened rain, but rendered even the dark hours of a midsummer night oppressive in their impenetrable gloom.

Each officer and man in the columns knew exactly the purport and extent of the operations required from him, Lord Roberts' object being to secure, undamaged, a big slice of the main line to Paris. The Commander-in-Chief himself met the columns at their rendezvous in the outskirts of Pont de l'Arche, where the railway crosses the Seine to the south side.

Right in front lay the chalk hills strongly held by the French, and behind them the large village of Gaillon, where the French headquarters were situated. Lord Roberts felt that if the comparatively small, but carefully selected expedition, could only succeed in reaching and holding this centre until the culmination of the general attack at daybreak, the remainder of the railway to Vernon and Mantes, and thence to the environs of Paris, would be practically in his possession.

It was a bold stroke, and if matters went even a little to his liking a certain measure of success would be attained, for it would be much to have in his grasp the iron road even to Gaillon, which is nearly eighty miles from Havre, and about equidistant from Paris.

The chief difficulty which faced Sir Frederick Carrington and General Caldecott was to keep a straight direction towards Gaillon after the fighting commenced in the broken country.

They were discussing this matter with the chief when Harington, who attended Lord Roberts as aide-de-camp, was suddenly tempted to risk a snub by making a suggestion.

"Could not the drums and bugles be used?" he said.

"What on earth for?" said Lord Roberts.

Harington was sure that he had made an ass of himself, but he persisted bravely:

"Well, sir, it seems to me that once the attack begins the necessity for further concealment disappears. By placing some drums and bugles near the head of each column, accompanied by officers whose sole duty it would be to note the line of march, the men could always tell in which direction to rally after a skirmish."

The three experienced generals to whom he spoke listened in silence; then the two brigadiers looked at Lord Roberts to learn his opinion.

"It is a mad notion," he said at last: "but mad notions savour of genius in this campaign."

"It will be the most celebrated incident of the war if it comes off," said Sir Frederick Carrington.

"I like it," remarked Caldecott, with a laugh. "It will please the boys and astound the Frenchman."

The Commander-in-Chief turned sharply round upon Harington:

"Have you had a letter to-day from that girl, Lady What's her-name—I mean your sweetheart?"

Harington blushed down to his boots—or it felt something like it—as he admitted the justice of the Chief's extraordinary suspicion, for Irene was at Havre with her corps of nurses.

"Then, by all the gods of Asia, we'll do it!" cried Lord Roberts. "That young woman brings luck."

And that was how the famous "March of the Drums and Bugles" commenced.

How it ended is a matter of history.

When the advance guards of the columns encountered the French pickets the latter imagined that a reconnaissance was in progress, and promptly retired upon their supports. On the foot-hills of the range two regiments, the 61st and 117th Chasseurs à Pied, were encamped under arms, and they turned out to drive off the audacious midnight marauders who thus presumed to disturb their rest.

After a lively ten minutes with the 1st Battalion of the Highland Light Infantry and the 2nd Battalion of the Buffs, who led Carrington's column on the right, they found that there was unexpected trouble in store for them, and whilst they still strove to delay the advance the commandant hastily dispatched mounted messengers to the rear to warn the reserves.

About a quarter to one o'clock, as the two brigades were steadily breasting the hills, half-a-dozen bright rockets soared into the sky and lit up the landscape for miles around. They contained powerful illuminants expressly designed for the purpose of disclosing an enemy's whereabouts at night, and in their momentary radiance the full scope of the British attack was made clear to the French staff.

They were discussing the matter with the chief.

Hardly had the glare died out of the sky before there came to the ears of the astounded Frenchmen—loud above the rattle of musketry and the cries of the combatants—the measured boom of a big drum, played with all the energy of the drummer of the Buffs, followed by the quick rat-tat of the sidedrums beating a lively step.

Then the bugles rang out with triumphant clang, and for the next two hours relays of bandsmen kept up that never-to-be-forgotten roulade, with its far-sounding notes of simple but warlike music.

Digitized by Google

The French gathered round the columns like flies, but they were swept aside as though a hurricane had burst upon them. Up the slope of the mountainous barrier, over its crest, and down the reverse marched the irresistible forces of England, never halting or faltering for a moment, suffering grievously, but inflicting much greater loss upon the enemy, driving their way through the French position with a cool and jubilant courage which dismayed and unnerved their opponents.

Amidst the wild uncertainty of fighting, the French leaders still strove to beat back this storm-cloud which seemed to travel along a predestined and cyclonic path.

Général de Valois, roused from a brief slumber, came to the front on an engine with the chief members of his staff, their chargers being hastily crowded into a horse-box behind.

When they reached the neighbourhood of the fight — Sir Frederick Carrington's column being much nearer than they guessed—they rode furiously forward to ascertain definitely what was in progress.

As they neared the fighting-line, with its chaotic surging of bewildered troops, and its mounted officers galloping madly to and fro, a new and wild fanfare of bugles and drums came to them on the breeze, for the big drum of the Buffs had been burst by a Lebel bullet, and the incident had been seized to relieve the breathless bandsmen with a fresh set.

"What devilry is this?" cried de Valois. "Is there a fête going on, then?" and he spurred ahead more eagerly.

"The English are amusing themselves with us, as usual," muttered a young aide-de-camp to himself.

At this moment some wooden outbuildings of a farmhouse flamed forth in rapid blaze. They had been fired by the command of a French colonel, who hoped by this means to fix a rallying point for his own men, and give them some guidance in a last desperate attempt to hurl back their assailants.

Into the zone of flickering light came the Highland Light Infantry, who were received with such a storm of lead that their colonel ordered them to halt and lie down for a few minutes.

Still shrilly dominating the crackling reports of the rifle duel, the bugles blew their cheerful strains, and the rattle of the drums kept up undaunted beat.

"'Strewth!" said a crouching Tommy to his front rank man. "They're playin' a bit of the revally. An' it's a nice summer mornin', ain't it?" he added, as a bullet knocked his helmet off.

The cause of the brief delay soon became apparent. Two flanking parties of Buffs had swept round on the French position unobserved, and were now attacking the defenders with the bayonet. The Highland Light Infantry charged in front, when the diversion thus created gave an opportunity. Général de Valois was knocked off his horse, his staff shot or captured, and before the driver of the "special" knew what was the matter, he was nearly rammed into the fire-box by an enthusiastic Clyde engineer.

"The excellent captain gives you a final chance," he explained.

General Caldecott's column was equally fortunate on the left. They came across the field telegraph line, which they promptly cut, and at 3 a.m. the first intimation received by the inhabitants of Gaillon of the proceedings among the chalk hills was given by the now wavering notes and unsteady beats of bugles and drums marching through the village street.

Digitized by Google

Meeting here, Sir Frederick Carrington and General Caldecott exchanged a hasty hand grip, and at once took steps to render their victory complete.

A train was got together and ordered to proceed cautiously to Vernon, whither it would be followed by a second and a third, whilst reinforcements would be sent by road as speedily as might be.

Caldecott's column now retraced its steps along the line towards the French position, to safeguard it from attempts at destruction by isolated parties from the French right and left.

The precaution was wise but needless.

The whole of the French army was now subjected to a bitter attack by a superior force, and the growing daylight showed that they had been hopelessly scattered over a wide expanse of country. Pursuit was kept up by cavalry all day, as Lord Roberts was determined to prevent anything in the nature of concentration of small brigades. He wanted to have his hands free for the march to Paris.

On the second morning after the battle, the country being now fairly clear after the desultory fighting that had gone on for many hours, scouting parties of fresh cavalry and cyclists were formed for the purpose of thoroughly exploring the valley of the Epte and the Plaine de Sainte André.

Among these the Catford Cyclists Corps was prominent, and at their head was William Briggs, less stout and more soldierly than when we last saw him at the "Cat and Anchor."

War, with its tremendous significance to the individual, moulds a man's character with compelling touches, and Briggs was quieter, more self-contained, more serious in demeanour, after these few weeks of momentous campaigning.

There was little trace of the old-time bombast in the manner in which he gave orders to his followers. In one respect alone did his wonted weakness for display manifest itself. Big and heavy in his proportions, he was yet the fastest rider of them all, and it was with loving care that he inflated the tyres of his bike that morning preparatory to the long ride before him.

For twenty miles the party passed through peaceful villages and broad stretches of pasture land and cornfields, in which the peasants were tending their cattle and crops as though the epoch-making events occurring in the locality belonged to another country.

At some little distance from the village of Beuil, where a small bridge in the centre of the hamlet spans the river Euse, the cyclists entered upon a broad straight road, that above all else suggested a fast "spin."

Four of them at once took the lead, and were separated by a hundred yards from their companions when they raced into the village street, shaded by leafy chestnuts and walnut trees, and seemingly the quietest and most sequestered spot they had yet encountered in their extended reconnaissance.

In an instant the place blazed into sudden life with sputtering rifle-shots, and the screams of frightened women and children.

Brigg's three comrades were shot dead, and he himself only escaped a similar fate by a heavy fall over a kerbstone, which momentarily rendered him incapable of movement.

The remainder of the detachment pulled up and strove to make some show against the company of Zouaves they had so suddenly encountered. But the affair was hopeless from the outset. Barely a third of the party succeeded in racing off again, and many of them were wounded.

When Briggs recovered his breath he found himself surrounded by a group of soldiers, who surveyed him with grim curiosity, and an officer addressed him in French.

Briggs had managed to pick up a few words of the language, but he was quite unable to follow the rapid utterance of his questioner, whereupon the Frenchman used some English words:

"Spy, shoot you, is it not, in three minutes!"

"I am no spy," replied Briggs calmly, though his heart throbbed tumultuously as he looked at the officer's stern face. "I am a scout. Vous savvy. C'est proper dang la guerre."

Again the Frenchman became voluble, but he apparently addressed some questions to Briggs, who wholly failed to understand him. Someone was sent for, and a young soldier appeared who spoke English perfectly.

"The officer says," he told Briggs, "that he can shoot you as a spy—just now, this moment. And he will do this thing except on one condition. If you tell him truly the present position of your army and its line of march, with the strength of the leading divisions, he will grant you your life."

Briggs rose to his feet and looked proudly about him, for he was taller by inches than any of the Zouaves. "It is your officer, then, who would indeed make me a spy?" he said.

The Frenchman flushed, and the officer did not wait for the translation, for he had caught the drift of the words. He impatiently gave some orders, and the Englishman was placed with his back against the gable end of a house, whilst eight men drew up in single rank at ten paces distance and shouldered their Lebel rifles.

A fierce impulse seized him to rush upon them and surrender his life in desperate barter, but the succeeding thought showed him that the nobler way to die was with the dignified demeanour of a soldier who gave all for his country.

Again the young interpreter approached.

"The excellent captain gives you a final chance," he explained. "There is no dishonour in giving information which will be easily obtained before to-morrow. Will you, for the last time, tell him what he has asked you? Why don't you lie, you fool?" he added quickly, in an undertone.

Briggs looked at him with the glistening eyes of a hunted animal, but his thoughts were far away amidst the pleasant lanes of Kent, where his wife and little ones lived in a creeper-covered cottage during the summer months.

Anon his memories strayed to the bar-parlour of the inn at Catford where his voice was the loudest and his laugh the heartiest during the nightly gathering.

"Will you not answer?" came the sharp query, whilst the Zouave left his side and the officer raised his sword.

"Yes," cried Briggs. "Tell him——" Then he remembered, perhaps, the translator would not gratify his wish.

"Ecoutez-vous, soldats Français," he said in loud clear tones. "La Hongletaire est la première nation de la monde!"

There was an appreciable pause, and the firing-party stood at the ready.

Trees, sky, and houses began to dance madly before the Englishman's eyes, but he shouted again so vehemently that he was heard far down the village street: "La Hongletaire est la première—"

But he stopped, for out of the gathering mist in which all things were fast merging, there loomed in front of him the figure of the officer, who placed his hand upon his shoulder and spoke to him in kindly tones.

He turned with amazement to the young soldier who had previously addressed him, and the latter explained: "We Frenchmen do not commit murder," he said. "The officer but did try you to the end. He wishes you to rejoin your army."

And the officer himself, shaking Briggs vigorously by the hand, exclaimed:

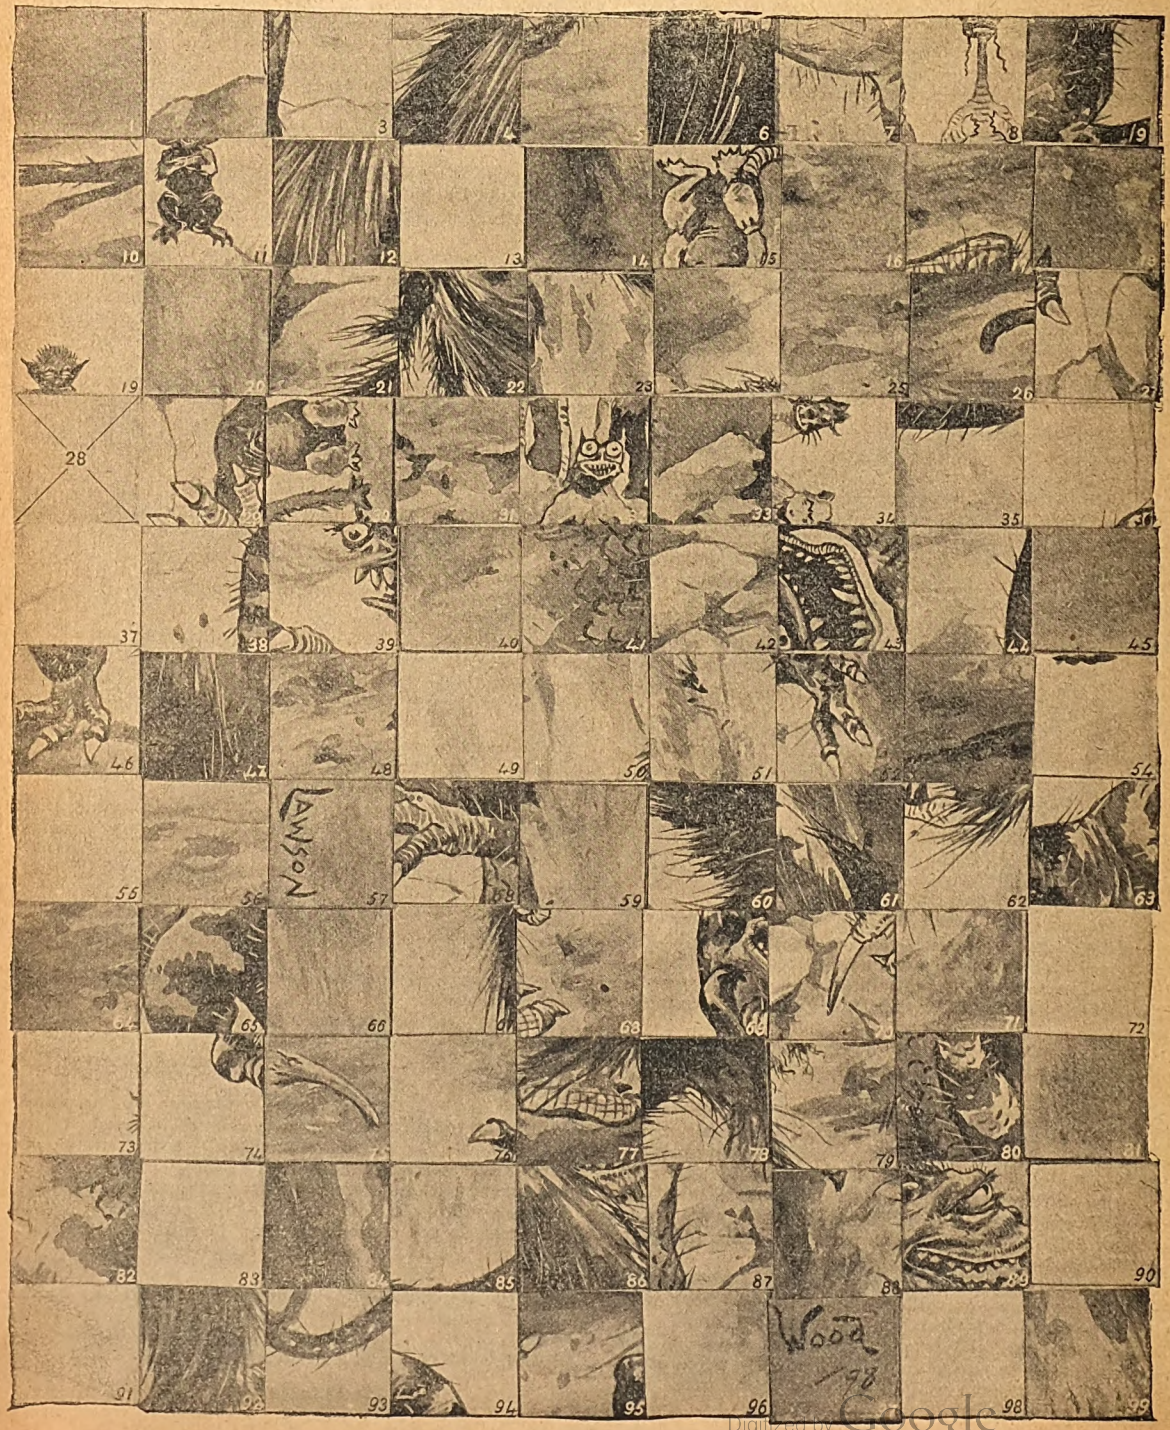
"Vous êtes brav' homme, m'sieur. Votre chemin est par là," and he pointed along the road to Vernon.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

MIXED PICTURE COMPETITION.

Cut out each of the following squares and paste them up on a sheet of paper to form a picture. Then copy out the figures in the re-arranged order, and send them to us in an envelope marked PICTURE. The squares are turned various ways, and that marked 28 is a blank. £2 2s. will be sent to the reader whose attempt is correct, or most nearly correct, and a copy of Annis Lennoy's book, "In a Chinese Garden," to each of the next twenty-five. In the event of a tie, the prizes will go to those whose solutions arrive first. Date of closing, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20th.



Digitized by Google

A Plunge for a Wife.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

By CATHERINE ADAMS.

"Well, Miss Vanfontein, and how shall we celebrate Christmas?" asked the Captain.

He was apparently addressing the heiress—possibly he thought she ought to be deferred to occasionally—but his eye sought Mrs. Pilcardy, a vivacious grass-widow.

"I really don't know," said Miss Vanfontein at length. She was rather scarce of ideas as a rule, and was not vivacious like Mrs. Pilcardy.

The heiress had been to the Cape to see some of her dead father's relatives, and she was now returning home by the liner Silenus. She lived at Tunbridge Wells with her maiden aunt, and was the absolute mistress of some £12,000 a year. But with all her wealth she was a very unassuming little person, rather insipid some people thought, but those who knew her well could testify that she was thoroughly to be depended on. As to her person, she was small, decidedly not pretty, and had pale blue eyes and dark brown hair.

Mrs. Pilcardy waited for a minute, tactfully giving Miss Vanfontein time to evolve a suggestion, then as none seemed forthcoming she prepared for action.

She was a handsome brunette with very expressive brown eyes.

There was a slight pause in the general conversation, and Mrs. Pilcardy adroitly attracted attention by firing off her small gun during the lull.

"I have an idea," she said demurely.

Seeing the inquiring look on the faces turned towards his end of the table, Captain Simmons explained that he was open to receive suggestions anent the forthcoming celebration of Christmas on board the Silenus.

"Mrs. Pilcardy is going to suggest something," he said.

"Oh, please," said the lady, "I do not feel equal to so much attention. It quite overcomes me."

"By jove! does she not, though?" whispered one man to his neighbour.

"And really, Captain Simmons, I am sorry that I spoke. My idea is not novel, not original, indeed it is so old that I feel quite ashamed to put it forward."

"Oh, come, Mrs. Pilcardy, we won't be hard on you," said someone reassuringly.

"Well, I suggest that we form a Christmas Festivity Committee, and arrange to have tableaux and theatricals on Christmas Eve, a series of old-fashioned games and forfeits on the evening of Christmas day, and on Boxing Day, a grand entertainment by way of bringing things to a successful climax. I propose that some of the gentlemen form a Sports Committee, which shall arrange something very unique in the way of sports for the morning or afternoon, and then in the evening wind up the festivities with a grand Masque Ball, prizes to be awarded to the wearers of the most effective and original costumes."

"Rather a big order!" said some gentleman.

"Quite a formidable programme," said another.

"I am quite sure that it can be carried through," said the Captain, thankful to find the task of suggestion and execution taken off his own shoulders.

As it only wanted a week to Christmas the ensuing days were full of the bustle of preparations. Possibly the members of the "Silenus Dramatic Society," bore the brunt of the work, for a vast amount of time was devoted to rehearsals.

The stage manager was a veritable gourmand for work, and he whipped up the lukewarm members of his company with commendable perseverance. As for the ladies, they were indefatigable; no amount of rehearsing or trying on of costumes seemed too much for their energies.

The Sports Committee contributed their quota to the work in hand very comfortably. They met for the most part in the smoking saloon, and as their labours tended to an unusual consumption of cigars and drinks, it is to be supposed that a great deal of oratory and energy was expended on the "programme of good, old-fashioned English sports" before it was finally drawn up and approved.

Though Miss Vanfontein had begged her hardest to be excused from taking part in the performance for Christmas Eve, she had at length been persuaded to help in one of the tableaux.

"Ridiculous!" said the florid Miss Chattaway to her sister in the privacy of their state-room, "why they want such a colourless bit of goods in the tableau, I can't imagine!"

Digitized by Google

"So vapid, too," replied her sister, "she does not seem to have an opinion on anything. I should not be at all surprised if she were to die an old maid for lack of not being able to make up her mind."

"It will not be for want of chances, then. Such a golden bait as she can hold out ought to make the fish rise fast enough."

"Indeed, yes," sighed the other, as she remembered the futility of her own long and persistent angling. "Men of to-day like well-gilded pills when they are forced to swallow matrimony."

Strangely enough, the subject of their remarks was also dwelling on the possibility of marriage.

She had had many offers, but she had refused them all from a morbid dread of being chosen for her wealth and not for herself.

"I shall be twenty-seven next month," she soliloquised as she brushed out her long hair. "Really, it is, as Aunt Martha says, quite time for me to choose a husband if I intend to marry."

She looked at her reflection in the glass, and by the bright glare of the electric light she espied two short white hairs standing up assertively among the curls of her fringe. She pulled them out quite viciously.

"Good Heavens! I shall look forty soon. Yes it is really time!" and then she sighed. All that night her dreams were disturbed by the attempt to rightly appraise the different qualities of two gentlemen who chanced to be voyaging to the old country on the Silenus.

During the past autumn she had seen a great deal of Major Ffoulkes and Mr. Baynes, and had received marked attentions from both. The major was rather a notable, and he was now on his way home to receive the coveted V.C.

Women love heroes, and as Major Ffoulkes was a very good-looking one, he came in for plenty of adulation. Minnie Vanfontein was a little creature, with plenty of latent love in her nature waiting to be stirred by the mighty god.

The Major's advances were not repelled, and she would have been quite ready to fall at his feet and worship him if her tendency to distrust all admirers had not held her in check. To-night something had happened to accelerate that distrust, for she had overheard a little conversation between Major Ffoulkes and one of his friends, and she was almost certain that it had referred to herself.

The ladies had all left the deck and gone below for the night, when Miss Vanfontein suddenly remembered that she had left her writing-pad on her deck-chair. Hurrying back to recover it, she had been arrested when half-way up the companion by the sound of voices.

"Well," said one with a boastful accent, "things look fairly promising. What will you bet me that I don't bring it off before we sight land?"

The voice was unmistakably that of the Major.

"I couldn't possibly lay anything on such a certainty as that," replied another voice. "I suppose that you will cut the service when you marry?"

"Rather!" the major had replied.

And then Miss Vanfontein crept away. Had Major Ffoulkes been alluding to herself? If so it was abominable, infamous! And so this was why the poor little soul pondered and worried and drew comparisons between the Major and her other admirer, John Baynes.

"Mr. Baynes is very nice, only not nearly so distinguished as the Major, and not nearly so good-looking. Neither is his family so good. Not that that matters. I only want someone to be good to me and love me for myself. How I wish I could see into their hearts and find out if they are really in earnest."

It was a pity she could not, for whereas she would soon have discovered that the Major's feeling for her was a selfish one, born of his desire to improve the impoverished estates he expected to succeed to, that of John Baynes was a pure and unselfish one.

Baynes was possessed of very fair private means, and he held a lucrative appointment under a celebrated firm of engineers, altogether he was in a position to support a wife very comfortably indeed. But he was a diffident man, and, as yet, was very far from sure that he had the remotest chance with the heiress. "For," he thought, "however could I make her believe that I had no ulterior view in asking her to be my wife?"

"Ffoulkes is pressing on pretty hard now, is he not?" asked his great friend, Clifford, one night.

Clifford was the first mate of the Silenus. He and Baynes had been apprentices together, in those days when John had thought a sea life the only life possible.

"I should think we might hear a bit of news before we land," said the mate, as his companion vouchsafed no reply.

"Oh, you do, do you?" then fiercely, "confound the Major!"

"Amen to that sentiment! I hate the fellow with his airs and graces. If a man has done a plucky thing, he should be all the more modest. Pooh! he has not done half so much as some poor beggars at sea have to do in dirty weather."

"But it is just where he scores off a fellow like myself," said Baynes ruefully. "I have no chance of showing my pluck, so Minnie—I mean Miss Vanfontein—doesn't know that I have any. But I have, and I only wish I could do something to show that I care for her and not her beastly fortune."

"Don't rile at the bawbees, my boy, you may be glad of them some day."

"Never!" said the other, "I'd marry her if she hadn't a penny. But I can't tell her so. She has refused a heap of fellows because she believes they want her money. I'd do anything to win her, I'd jump overboard, or I would——"

"By Jove! I have it!" said Clifford, and he jumped up and was gone in a flash.

Before Baynes could recover from his surprise, the mate was back again, with a bundle of papers and magazines.

"Look here; I hunted these up, thinking they might help the ladies with an idea for a tableau. And now, great Scott! if you and I, Jack, don't prepare the best tableau of the lot!"

"You have got a touch of the sun," put in Baynes.

"You'll live to thank me yet," said the mate, ignoring his friend's remark. "Look at this."

He opened the illustrated pages of an old Christmas number, and pointed to the picture depicting the dilemma of a young lady who was voyaging on a steamer, and who, in order to help her selection of a husband from the crowd of admirers on board, hit upon the peculiar expedient of jumping overboard and choosing the man who first came to her rescue.

"I'll keep this number back," said Clifford, "and I'll find an opportunity to give it to Miss Vanfontein when she is alone. I shall take care to draw her attention to the picture which possibly may lead her to do likewise, and then——"

Digitized by Google

"Good Heavens! do you mean to advise her to go overboard?"

"Why not? It would be a splendid chance for you to rush to the rescue, and I promise you to be on the alert and do all I can to minimise the fear of danger."

"Danger! I would not have an hair of her head injured."

"Baynes, I give you my word of honour that there is no danger. If she cottons to the idea, I will gently hint to her what would be the best time of day, also what part of the vessel would be safest to take her header from," said this Machiavellian seaman.

Finally he overbore the other's remonstrances, and next day he found a chance of presenting the magazine to Miss Vanfontein.

"I thought you might get an idea for your ball costume, Miss Vanfontein," and then, adroitly turning the leaves and the conversation at the same time, he showed her the pictorial story of the young lady who had such difficulty in selecting a husband.

Miss Vanfontein looked long and silently at the pictures and read the letter-press attentively.

"Rather a strange mode of getting out of a difficulty, and somewhat dangerous, I should think."

"Not at all if she went well for'ard and took off from the side. No danger at all if she chose a calm day and took care to see that the right people were at hand to rescue her.

"There!" he chuckled, when he left her to digest the picture and his remarks, "I could not have done better if I had graduated in a school of diplomacy. It's all right," he told Baynes, "I believe she means business, I took care to inform her that the afternoon would be best for such a performance, and of course that's my watch then."

Mr. Baynes turned quite pale.

"Clifford, I can't allow it, I feel it my duty to warn her——"

"Stuff and nonsense! Can't you be thankful for what the gods send you? By-the-bye, she is a splendid swimmer."

"Oh! is she?" said Baynes, half convinced.

All the same he was in a state of great mental excitement for the next few days, and he frequented the fore deck on each afternoon, dreading, he hardly knew what.

But nothing happened. And at last, Christmas Eve, with all its exciting concomitants of tableaux and dramatic performances, arrived.

Miss Vanfontein did not often hazard a remark at meals unless first addressed, so there was a little thrill of interest occasioned when she asked the Captain, with a nervous tremour in her voice, if there were any sharks about.

"Sharks, Miss Vanfontein? Not in these waters. We shan't catch sight of the beasts until we are nearer land. Wait till we sight Cape Verd; possibly there may be a few to be seen then."

"And when will that be?"

"In a few days' time. Possibly next Wednesday," and the Captain went on with his dinner.

A look of relief passed over the heiress's face, but a feeling of horror nearly overcame John Baynes as he reflected that there might be a stray shark about.

When the passengers went up on deck and the members of the "Silenus Dramatic Society" disappeared to prepare for the performance, Clifford came up to John Baynes with a "I told you so!" look on his face.

"Heard that about the sharks, old man? I believe she will do it to-morrow!"

Owing to his anxiety regarding Miss Vanfontein's intentions, poor Baynes did not much enjoy the dramatic treat provided by his fellow voyagers; and he forbore to make the most of the opportunity he had of making himself pleasant to the heiress when she came and sat among the audience after performing her part in the tableaux.

"Well," she said with her shy smile, "how did you like it? Did I tremble much? How did it go off?"

"Oh, yes, yes; very nice, very nice indeed," he said hastily.

"Poor Andromeda!" she said, softly. "Perseus saved her from a terrible fate, did he not?"

"She might have been eaten by sharks," he replied.

Miss Vanfontein stared at him aghast.

"Oh, really!" she protested, "I never heard that, I always understood she was threatened by some terrible sea-monster, but not sharks, Mr. Baynes."

"Oh, well," he said recovering himself quickly, "mythology is mythical, always, and it might have been a shark."

Mr. Baynes showed no delight in the really creditable performance of the musical dialogue acted by two vivacious young ladies, nor did he evince emotion, when, in the final scene of "The Truant Prince," Mrs. Pilcaby appeared with her hair all down her back and visible tears streaming down her cheeks. Neither did he laugh when they distinctly overheard a lady behind let out the secrets of the dressing-room, and tell her neighbour that the tears were streaks of vaseline and the hair—"Well, a good bit of it pinned on, my dear, only you must not tell!"

While the others were in shrieks of laughter at the extravaganza that concluded the entertainment, the muscles of Mr. Baynes' face never relaxed once. Miss Vanfontein felt disappointed, she had always thought him very easily amused, and he was always ready to smile at her own little jokes. But perhaps, there was a reason for that, and at the thought she shrank up into her shell again, vexed to think she had been so amiable to him.

"What's the matter with Baynes? He looks as if he had been crossed in love," said Major Ffoulkes, taking the seat lately vacated by Baynes.

"I should say that he had," said a pert girl sitting on the other side of the heiress, and shooting a quizzical glance in her direction.

Miss Vanfontein blushed.

"I should say it was the heat," she said severely, "did I not overhear someone remarking that he cordially echoed Sydney Smith's wish to be able to 'sit in his bones,' and that he would like them to be packed away in the chef's refrigerator?"

"I believe I did say something of the sort," owned the Major, "and I think I had just cause, we are not very far off from the line, now."

But Miss Vanfontein was angry with herself for the blush, and vexed with her neighbours for causing it. So, what should have proved a most enjoyable evening was, as far as two of the audience were concerned, very disappointing.

Christmas Day was ushered in by a comical attempt to imitate the old English custom of carol-singing. A few sturdy sailors with sonorous voices, helped by a few musical esprits from the steerage passengers, promenaded the decks very early, singing "While shepherds watched," and "Hark! the herald angels sing." Lack of rehearsals and a proficient bâton caused the rendering to be somewhat wanting in precision and tune, and there was a superabundance of bass; still the voices made up in gusto and abandon what they failed in artistic training, and the morning opened auspiciously.

Digitized by Google

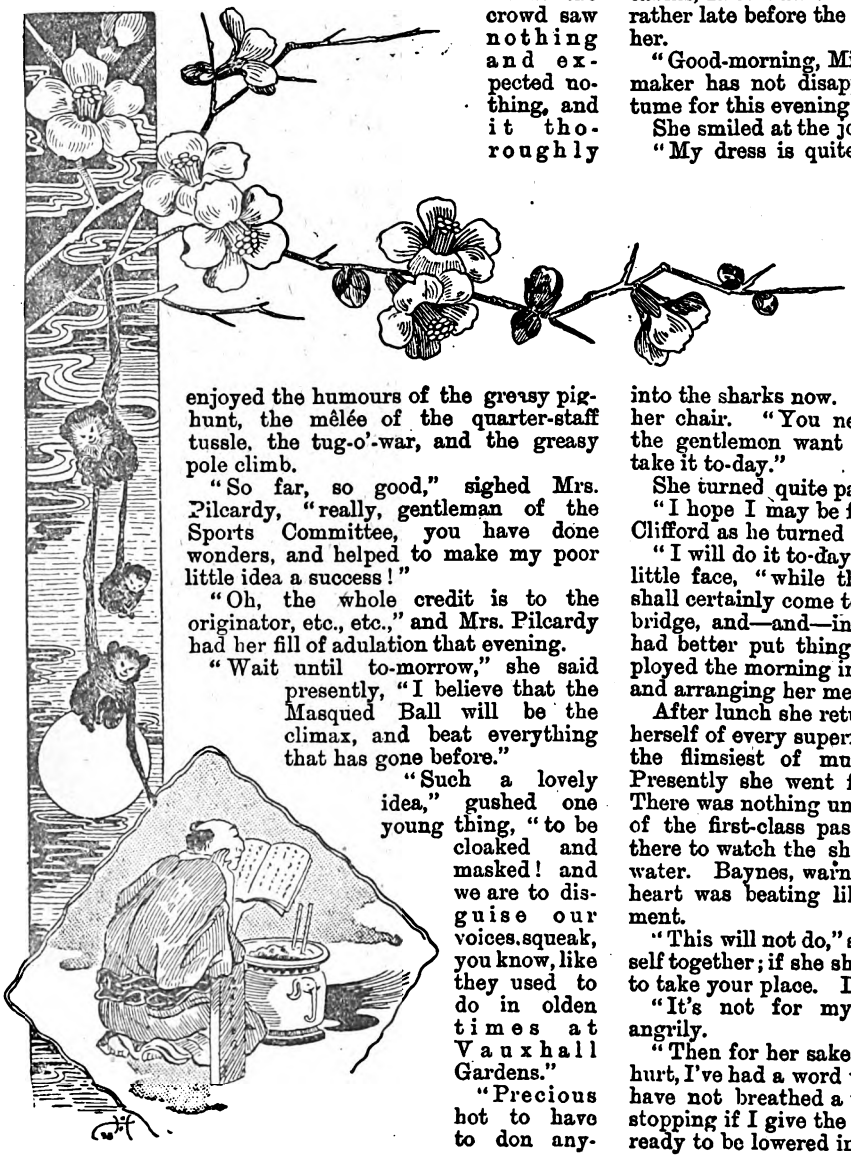
After service and luncheon they all repaired to the promenade deck to witness the "Unrivalled Fête and Exhibition of Old English Sports."

Mr. Baynes kept an anxious eye upon the movements of the heiress. He was quite sure that if she made the attempt to jump overboard, it would be in the afternoon, during Clifford's watch.

It was a very calm day, the sea scarcely heaved, and the only movement was caused by the screw of the great steamer as she ploughed her way northward.

Once or twice Baynes caught Miss Vanfontein looking fixedly out to sea with a peculiarly intent gaze. He wished most heartily that Clifford had not shown that picture to the heiress, for the suspense was awful.



But the crowd saw nothing and expected nothing, and it thoroughly enjoyed the humours of the greasy pig-hunt, the mêlée of the quarter-staff tussle, the tug-o'-war, and the greasy pole climb.

"So far, so good," sighed Mrs. Pilcardy, "really, gentleman of the Sports Committee, you have done wonders, and helped to make my poor little idea a success!"

"Oh, the whole credit is to the originator, etc., etc.," and Mrs. Pilcardy had her fill of adulation that evening.

"Wait until to-morrow," she said presently, "I believe that the Masqued Ball will be the climax, and beat everything that has gone before."

"Such a lovely idea," gushed one young thing, "to be cloaked and masked! and we are to disguise our voices, squeak, you know, like they used to do in olden times at Vauxhall Gardens."

"Precious hot to have to don anything extra this weather," grumbled one portly gentleman.

"Ah, but you need not overdo it underneath," advised the ship's doctor, who needless to say was an Irishman.

"Clifford," said Baynes, when dinner was over, and the company, with a very good grace, had partaken of hot roast beef and hot plum pudding with the thermometer at 103deg. in the shade, "I can't stand this any longer, it's wearing me quite out."

"Umph!" said Clifford, "you do look rather chippy. But it is wearing, I admit. I've been on the look-out all this blessed afternoon. I'll give her a hint to-morrow morning."

On Boxing Day most of the ladies did not rise very early, wisely electing to reserve their strength for the ball. A great many had their breakfasts served in their cabins, Miss Vanfontein among the number, so it was rather late before the mate had a chance of speaking to her.

"Good-morning, Miss Vanfontein, I hope the dressmaker has not disappointed you regarding your costume for this evening?"

She smiled at the joke.

"My dress is quite ready, but I shall give you no further information, for no one knows what anyone else is to wear!"

"Well, I suppose we shall have queerer company soon than what we shall see to-night," he said.

"Oh!" and she looked her mystification.

"We shall soon be running into the sharks now. Oh!" for she had jumped up from her chair. "You need not be alarmed, but if any of the gentlemen want a swim I should advise them to take it to-day."

She turned quite pale.

"I hope I may be forgiven for such lies," thought Clifford as he turned away.

"I will do it to-day," she said with a set, determined little face, "while that nice Mr. Clifford is about, I shall certainly come to no harm if he is near or on the bridge, and—and—in case anything should happen I had better put things in order a little." So she employed the morning in writing directions for her maid, and arranging her memoranda and letters.

After lunch she returned to her cabin, and divesting herself of every superfluous bit of clothing, she put on the flimsiest of muslins and then went on deck. Presently she went forward and on to the fore-deck. There was nothing unusual in such an action, as some of the first-class passengers were very fond of going there to watch the ship cleaving her way through the water. Baynes, warned by Clifford, followed her. His heart was beating like a sledge-hammer with excitement.

"This will not do," said the mate, "you must pull yourself together; if she should bring it off now, I shall have to take your place. Don't lose heart now."

"It's not for myself, it's for her," said Baynes angrily.

"Then for her sake pull yourself together. She can't hurt, I've had a word with the chief engineer—no, no! I have not breathed a word, the engines won't be long in stopping if I give the word—and there's a boat close by ready to be lowered immediately I give the signal. And by George! Do you see? She has changed her dress. She means business this afternoon. Here comes the Major, now keep your weather-eye open."

Digitized by Google

Miss Vanfontein sauntered to the side of the vessel with a seemingly nonchalant air. In reality her excitement and nervousness were infinitely more pronounced than that of John Baynes.

She looked with awe into the green depths below, then she looked towards the stern where the screw had left a white track which spread far behind, showing the course of the vessel. No, it would not do to be caught in the great wash which surged up and down in the wake of the Silenus. She must jump well off the side and from her present position on the fore-deck.

She shivered a little, though the sun poured down with fierce rays. Presently, she gave a little glance round. Yes, the Major and Mr. Baynes were both in her vicinity and the mate was on the bridge. Only a few steerage passengers were between her and the two men whose courage she wished to test.

She made ready to spring—but at the vital moment her courage failed her. She caught up her Dachsund, Fido, and flung him far out into the waves. Then, with a shriek, she shrank from view and cowered down behind a pile of empty fish baskets.

It happened so suddenly that the people near, hearing the splash and missing Miss Vanfontein at the same moment, concluded that it was she who had gone overboard.

"Man overboard!" they shouted in chorus.

Clifford was the only person who saw what really happened. He rang the electric bells to the engine-room, giving the signal to stop, and he shouted an order for the boat to be lowered, then he came rushing along to the fore-deck to Baynes and the Major.

"Good Heavens! It's Miss Vanfontein! She's gone over!"

"Where!" cried Baynes, rushing to the side.

"Where!" shouted the Major.

"There! yonder she goes," cried the mate, pointing to a dark object bobbing up and down in the water, and which the speed of the vessel had left some distance behind.

It is to be hoped that the recording angel was not very hard upon the mate of the Silenus at this particular juncture of his career.

At this moment the great engines stopped in what Captain Simmons afterwards thought to be an unprecedented minimum of time, and as he came up to order a boat to be lowered he found the men already busy with it.

And he again congratulated himself on the exceeding smartness of his officers and men.

But John Baynes had already plunged in to the rescue. He had not seen the accident, but at the first word from the mate he had rushed aft, and flinging off his coat, he had taken a header into the waves.

Major Foulkes did not stir from where the boat was being launched.

"Can't you swim? Are you not going to try for her?" said the mate cynically.

"Yes, I can swim. But one fool need not make many. If a woman likes to be so stupid as to jump or fall overboard when the ship's going at full speed, she must take her chance."

And Miss Vanfontein heard every word he said.

She came forward at once.

"Thank you!" she said, flashing a glance at him that would have credited a Bernhardt.

The Captain came up.

"Who the dickens is overboard then?" he said, staring angrily at the heiress.

"My dog is," said she calmly.

Then the Captain turned about, and he swore for the space of half-a-minute in the best, double-distilled, seagoing vernacular.

He apologised afterwards, but it must be admitted that he was hard pressed when he found his vessel had been stopped all for the sake of a poor little whippersnapper of a—but there! what he said about that dog is not worth repeating.

"And now there's the deuce to pay," said Clifford mendaciously, "for poor Baynes, thinking that it was Miss Vanfontein gone overboard, dashed like a maniac to the rescue, and," he lowered his voice for dramatic effect, "he's a very poor swimmer."

"Oh!" shrieked the heiress, and she wrung her hands desperately.

"Oh!" roared the Captain, "what a consummate ass! What a fool!"

"Sir!" Miss Vanfontein turned on him like a fury. Could it be possible that such a meek and mild little person could be so transformed? "Sir," she repeated, "Mr. Baynes is neither an ass, nor a fool!" She nearly choked over the words. "He is a gentleman and a very brave one. He is not the only person who made the mistake of thinking that it was I who had fallen over. There are others, but they did not think fit to move."

Though she spoke in the plural number she turned a withering glance in the Major's direction.

"Oh, Mr. Clifford, can't you do something?" she appealed to the mate. "Oh, do please save him!" Then she broke down completely and sobbed hysterically.

"Take her below—take her below!" said the Captain testily. Some ladies who had been attracted from their siestas by the commotion, kindly took charge of the heiress and, in spite of her protestations, dragged her to her cabin, where they administered smelling-salts and such consolation as they could.

"Oh! he will be drowned!" she cried between her sobs.

"We must hope for the best," one told her, "and oh! there goes the boat." She was looking through the porthole as she spoke. "The engines were stopped so quickly, Mr. Baynes can't be very far off."

Meanwhile, Baynes had struck out vigorously towards a black object which he could see floating in the distance. But though he was swimming fast he wondered why he could not get near. The fact was that poor doggie was doing his best to keep afloat, only he was going away from the steamer. Baynes began to feel rather exhausted by the time he succeeded in getting to close quarters. He was short sighted and had no idea that the object he was endeavouring to reach was other than the dark head of the heiress. He looked round to see if the boat were coming.

"Boat ahoy!" he called faintly. He began to have his doubt of holding out much longer.

"This way!" he called, "Miss Vanfontein, you are going away from the ship. There's a boat coming along."

Then as he got still nearer, he wondered if his senses were leaving him. What was it, and where was the heiress?

The splash of oars sounded close.

"All right," called the third mate. "We'll soon hand you in, and then we'll take in the little dog."

Digitized by Google

"Miss Vanfontein?" gasped Baynes.

"Is safe on board. 'Twas the little dog that fell over."

Baynes groaned aloud. Then all his arduous work had been in vain! He ground his teeth and reviled the interfering Clifford. The sailors thought he was done up as they lifted him in and he sank in a heap at the bottom of the boat.

"I should like to peg out after this," he thought, "I'll sham unconsciousness, I really could not stand any chaff just yet." He lay very still and with closed eyes.

"Case for the doctor," said the third mate, "go it, men, pull your hardest."

"Oh!" shrieked one of the ladies ministering to Miss Vanfontein, "here is the boat coming back! There is your dog, Miss Vanfontein, he is all right, shaking himself, but oh! poor Mr. Baynes, he is lying at the bottom of the boat, and oh! my dear, my dear, I think you must prepare for the worst!"

They were kind-hearted souls, and they wept in company with the distracted heiress.

When the boat came alongside it took some minutes to haul up the apparently lifeless body of Mr. Baynes. The people on deck were waved back without ceremony, a stretcher was brought and Baynes was conveyed to the doctor's quarters. Clifford, entirely taken back by this unexpected turn of events, followed anxiously.

"He was swimming well and strongly," he thought, "what can have turned him like that?"

The doctor gave his orders and made his preparations quickly enough. He had been having a nap and had heard nothing of the incident until the boat was returning. He thought it a case for resuscitation from drowning.

"Look here! doctor," whispered Clifford anxiously, "I think he his only exhausted. Send the others away."

The doctor cleared the room, and then proceeded to felt his patient's pulse.

"Why!" he ejaculated.

The lifeless body sat up erect.

"Look here, doctor. I am all right, only I don't want to come round just yet, see?"

The doctor thought he did.

"Oh! you scoundrel!" cried Baynes, shaking his fist at Clifford.

"Don't call me names," said the mate.

"I think it would be only right to inform the lady who was the cause of your immersion of your recovery, for I hear she is in a great way," said the doctor.

"Oh, is she?" said Baynes, colouring up to his ears.

"Umph! I suppose it is a case of love me, love my dog?" said the doctor with a grin.

"Perhaps it is," said Baynes.

"I think I will go and allay Miss Vanfontein's anxiety," said the astute mate.

But he only allayed her fears a little.

He thought it just as well to pile on the agony for a little longer.

"There is just a chance for the poor fellow," he said, "but I don't think I'd build on it too much. The doctor is doing his level best, but it may be some time yet before he recovers—if he does," he added significantly.

And so Mr. Baynes' recovery was kept dark for a little longer, but at tea-time the mate had pity on the distress of Miss Vanfontein.

"He is coming round," he told her. "In fact, I should not be surprised if he turns up at the ball tonight, and if he does—he has been through something, Miss Vanfontein—you will be nice to him, won't you? and thank him for what he has done?"

"Oh, I will, I will!" she cried with shining eyes, and clasping her hands nervously.

"That is all right," chuckled the mate as he retired.

When the Masque Ball was at its brightest and merriest, a tall figure, wearing the regulation mask and domino, came on deck rather late.

Miss Vanfontein had purposely abstained from dancing, and she had been busy trying to identify some of the gentlemen. She was certain that the late comer was Baynes. The electric light made the ship as bright as at noontide, and she could see quite plainly the little gold snake ring which he always wore on his little finger.

Rendered brave by her disguise, she went boldly up to him.

"Come," she said, touching him on the arm, "I wish to speak to you."

He followed her without a word on to the fore-deck, where there was comparative solitude. "Is it Mr. Baynes?" she asked, as they moved to the side of the vessel.

There was a full moon, the night was cloudless, the sea glimmered in the silver radiance, and as they turned to seaward, the light fell on Miss Vanfontein's quivering face as she removed her mask.

"Will you take yours off?" she said sharply, "I want to be quite sure of you."

He did as she requested and she saw John Baynes' face, pale and earnest, in the moonbeams.

"How ever am I to thank you?" she asked. "I know that you thought that it was I who had gone overboard I think you are one of the bravest of men. How can I thank you?"

His eyes were pregnant with a great emotion, but he never spoke.

Was it possible? she thought. Did this man love her self and not her wretched fortune?

"If," he said, after a long pause, and in unsteady tones, "if you were a penniless girl, I would tell you how you might thank me."

"Tell me," she said softly. "Just imagine that I am a penniless girl, and—tell me."

Then he told her.

Johnson: "Some people are continually wanting to know the why and wherefore of everything. They are not content to accept facts as they find them."

Jackson: "Yes, you're right. I wonder why it is?"

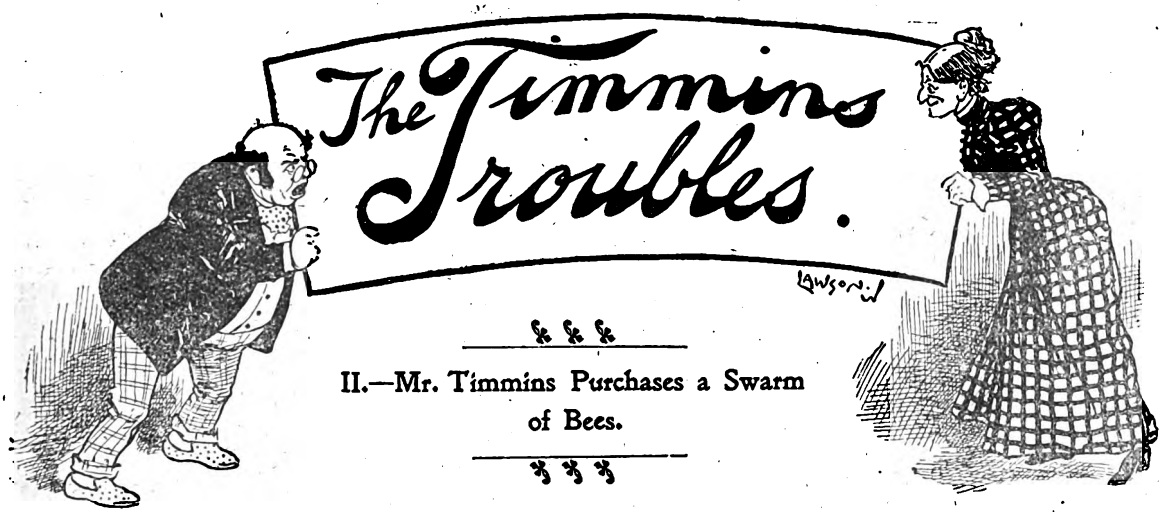
Jacob: "How was it I didn't see you at the Oppenheimer wedding, Ikey?"

Isaac: "It cost me too much, Jakey, to send a present. So I just ask how such a nice young man could marry into such a family, and I gets no invitation."

"What's the matter with my darling?" asked the fond mother as she came upon her little one, crushed in a heap in the middle of the floor and kicking the air with her stockinged feet. "Where's her pretty new shoes?"

"I wo—won't have 'em, na—nas—nasty old things! Ne—Nellie's squeaks like ev—ev'ryfing and mine don't squeak a bi—bi—bit."

Digitized by Google



II.—Mr. Timmins Purchases a Swarm of Bees.

"I HAVE been reading up on the culture of bees for the past month, and have come to the conclusion that it would be economical to keep a few, rather than continue to buy our honey," said Mr. Timmins as he laid aside his paper.

"That would be perfectly grand. Can you buy some?" Mrs. Timmins inquired.

"Yes, Anna, I have already bought a swarm, and they will be delivered to-night."

"Where will you put them?" she asked.

"Under the tree in the back yard, my dear."

"Can't you put them in the shed, Henry? I am afraid they will sting if you put them so close to the house."

"Put them in the shed," he exclaimed, sneeringly. "Well, I'll be quartered. Mrs. Timmins, you are at the head of the class in the bee business. Wouldn't it be a good scheme to put them in a barrel and head it up? Or do you have an idea that they drive them in the shed at night, and tie them up as you do cows?"

"No, I don't think any such thing; but I don't want to be chased into the house every time I step out of doors by a lot of ugly bees," she replied.

"This stinging business is all fudge. The honey bee is constituted very much the same as domestic animals; they want to know their master. If you show any sign of fear, they will jump on you; but if you walk firmly up and cuff one, he will hurry into the hive and behave himself. It requires a little nerve, Mrs. Timmins—a little nerve, that's all."

The next morning they went out to see how the bees were getting on. There were a cluster of bees on the front of the hive, and Mrs. Timmins remarked that she did not believe they were satisfied with their location, or they would go into the hive.

"I know what is the trouble," said Timmins, "The man I bought them of told me that when they hung out in that way the boxes were filled with honey, and I must replace them with empty ones."

"Will you send for him to show you how?" she inquired.

"Mrs. Timmins, I don't ask anyone's advice about how to handle a bee."

"I thought perhaps you had not had them long enough to be acquainted with them," she soothingly remarked.

"It is not necessary to have an introduction and shake hands with a bee to know him, or he to know you, Mrs. Timmins. If you go sneaking round his place of business in a half-scared way, you are liable to come in contact with the sportive part of his disposition. While, on the other hand, if you walk up to the hive with an air of ownership and authority, he will step to one side and look on. I will take these six boxes and put them in the place of the ones filled with honey."

He walked up behind the tree, reached round, and removed the top of the hive. About a pint of bees came dashing out, and one of them alighted on his neck, which caused him to drop his boxes and claw him off.

"There, my fine fellow, I think you will mind your own affairs next time," he remarked.

The next instant one struck him under the eye, while another was trying to drive his harpoon through his ear, and a third was drilling a shaft through his cheek.

"Look out for yourself," he yelled to Mrs. Timmins, at the same time striking at the bees with his fist and hat.

"Oh, Moses!" he ejaculated, as he slapped his thigh. "Take that, you humming, howling maniac!" he roared "Great guns! They are crawling up inside my trouser legs! Bring me the broom! make a fire! set the house on fire! I must have some smoke, or I am a dead man," he cried.

He slapped his legs with his hand, and pounded his head with his hat, and in that way he fought his way from the hive to the kitchen door, when Bridget came out, and a bee stung her on the nose. She grasped her nose with both hands and ran, yelling.

"Did any of them sting you, Henry?" asked Mrs. Timmins, as she put her head in at the kitchen door.

He rose to his feet and faced her. His left eye was entirely closed, and his right ear hung down almost to his shoulder, while his face and neck were covered with various sized protuberances.

"Why, Timmins, what a sight you are! Sit down in this chair while I bathe your face in salt and water."

"This is another of your ingenious jobs, Mrs. Timmins. If you never eat any honey until I gather it for you, it will taste good when you get it," he groaned, as he sat down in the chair.

"You did not impress the bees with your air of ownership and authority, Henry," she said, as she patted his swollen eye with the wet cloth.

Digitized by Google

A drop of the brine splattered into the eye that was open. He groaned as he pushed his wife on one side, and rubbed his eye with his shirt-sleeve.

"That's right, Mrs. Timmins, put the other eye out; then you can run me into any of your traps! As a blind man my days would be numbered," he growled.

Bridget came downstairs with a nose that strongly resembled a vegetable marrow, with the stem fastened on her face. Squaring herself before Timmins, and pointing towards her nose, she said:

"Do ye see that, ye imp of consate and villainy? Do you notice the shape ye've got on me illigant nose—the pride of Mike's heart? Do you see it? And it's his night to call, so it is! Och, murther, I'm undone! But if the shape of that nose breaks off the match between us, I'll have the law on ye before the sun goes down to-morrow! Do ye moind that?"

A ghastly smile crept over Mr. Timmins' irregular features, and he tried to give an expression to his crippled eye, but did not succeed.

"Yes, Bridget," he replied, "I can see it: and, although my eyesight is very much impaired, I think, with the sky for a background, I could see that nose nine hundred miles away. In other words it is a prominent feature, and denotes great strength of character; and when you lay it across Mike's shoulder, while you whisper your vows of eternal constancy in his ear, he will see mirrored in its glossy surface the future happiness of your wedded life; and then he will bless the little bee that in a sportive moment toyed with your dainty nose."

"If it wasn't for the blindness av ye, I would break yer head with the fire-shovel, you long-eared murtherer. Sure, if I had an ear like that on me head, I could hear the chirp of a cricket two miles off." And she indignantly swept out of the room.

"Anna, I forgive you for getting me into this scrape. I am amply avenged. The sight of that nose repays me for all my suffering," said Timmins, as he rose from his chair and tottered to the bedroom to lie down.

"And your husband fell from the Eiffel Tower?"
"Yes. How I wish it had been taller!"
"Monster! You rejoice at his death?"
"Sir, you insult me! I wanted him to live longer."

"The doctor would like to see you inside," said the maid to the caller in the reception room.

"Not if I know it," said the startled patient. "He can't try an X-ray on me."

"There is some comfort in being the father of twins," said the unhappy-looking passenger, to which the fat passenger, being there for that purpose, inquired, "What?"

"They keep each other awake of nights as well as my wife and me."

Mrs. Wicklins: "You and your husband and Mr. and Mrs. Caddsley seem to be good friends."

Mrs. Dimpleton: "Yes. You see, Mr. Caddsley and I used to be engaged."

Mrs. Wicklins: "But I don't understand why that fact should make you enjoy each other's society now?"

Mrs. Dimpleton: "Well, of course, I can't speak for him, but he married a woman who is at least five years older than I am and not half as good looking, if I do say it myself. You don't know what a comfortable feeling takes possession of me when we are together and I see him glancing first in her direction and then in mine."

£100 OFFERED THIS WEEK. £100

This week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses 100 envelopes to 100 people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD

and address it to the Editor under the following conditions: Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

One hundred names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 12 distribution must reach us by December 27th, addressed to The 12th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of Distribution No. 9.

Four of the fifty sovereigns offered have this week been claimed by:

G. T. Hill, 12 Medlicott Road, Sparkbrook, Birmingham.

William Wallace. 1 Ferguson Place, Burntisland.

W. H. Westlake, 2 Rownham Place, Clifton, Bristol.

Mrs. J. Workman, 18 Beach Street, Swansea.

The unclaimed sovereigns were addressed to:

J. T. McBride, Lift Attendant, Central Buildings, Liverpool; Mrs. F. Fenning, 75 Lady Margaret Road, N.W.; G. Stokes, 36 Fitzroy Square, W.; J. Young, 24 Marshall Place, Perth; W. L. Lemon, Uffculme, Devon; G. F. Matthews, 20 West Street, Chichester; W. A. Smith, 33 York Terrace, Leigh, Lancashire; J. D. Lister, 105 Noel Street, Nottingham; H. Owen, 32 High Street, Wimbledon; F. Jones, Sutton Weaves, near Warrington; Miss B. G. Jeffrey, 4 Albert Terrace, St. Edmund's, Church Street, Salisbury; J. M. Bradley, Church Street, Wulmslow, Cheshire; H. Larkin, 7 St. Jone Street, Lichfield; J. Jonas, 1 Mill Street, Hanley; W. H. Cleaver, 19 Garfield Street, Kettering; A. F. Smith, Pear Tree, Newchurch, Isle of Wight; A. Nash, Confectioner, Milford, Surrey; W. Kinch, Worthington Lodge, Worthington, Wigan; R. Jenkins, John Street, Porthcawl; E. Lawrence, 4 Mount Pleasant, Chepstow; James Walker, Selkirk Street, Hamilton; J. Rance, Queen's Road, Great Marlow; Mrs. Downing, Fair View, Pedmore, Worcestershire; Mrs. Robson, Grove Hill, Kelso; J. W. Vickers, Wentworth House, Craven Road, Newbury, Berks; W. J. Nagle, 17 North Street, Skibbereen; R. J. Ussher. J.P., Cappagh, Lismore R.S.O., Co. Waterford; James O'Brien, New Street, Church Gresley; Alfred Lygo, 6 Gold Street, Leicester; James Marshall, Ferndale, Cherry Hinton; James Grice, Leicester Villas, Sheringham, Norfolk; Mrs. Hatch, Ranmark House, Ranelagh Road, Felixstowe; W. Treble, East Street, Okehampton, Devon; H. Phillips, Castle Street, Liskeard; Chas. Santer, The Bridge, Cranbrook, Kent; J. S. Rattenbury, 4 Dockyard Terrace, Sheerness; H. T. Winter, Brockhampton, Herefordshire; Mrs. Valentine, 41 Broad Street, Ludlow; J. A. York, Horse Market, Barnard Castle; F. Park, Gloster View, Warkworth; E. Unrah, 3 Petterill Street, Carlisle; J. Thompson, Station Road, Kirkby Stephen; W. King, Linwood Road, Market Rasen; A. M. Macgregor, 7 Westbourne Terrace Road, W.; A. F. Woodward, 54 Mill Street, Liverpool; Mrs. Gifford, 41 Hockliffe Road, Leighton Buzzard.

JUMBLE STORY.] # BE LACK OF IT. [FOR CONDITIONS SEE PAGE 864.

I was seated by my fireside one afternoon, just as Fritz was crouching in the opposite corner, his intended enjoyment of the evening.

I do not mind confessing that had I not known that about his private affairs, but he had not mentioned about the telephone and various others of our everybody?"

I turned with a shudder and saw him with a long thoroughfare in the German city of Leipzig. He forgot, momentarily, my fear in the contemplation of evening. It was very cold and windy; snowflakes muttering wild words in a disjointed fashion. I felt that he would use violence if I persisted and he consequently did not reveal anything; had he really ——"

"Yes, suddenly, three hours ago," he went on feverglaring at the figure of Elsie; I felt that Fritz was written in his own language the word "friend" came from my dry throat.

He gripped my arm so vigorously that he hurt me. I envied my friend his good fortune—a bewitching tube and a mouthpiece; at the end of the tube was eyes fixed upon the form on the couch.

"But, my dear fellow, the thing is an utter friend of his. The letter was written in English—feverishly busy; then I saw—did I see it?—the impossibility!" I exclaimed in amazement.

"Yes," he continued—more to himself than to me, the young lady was betrothed, I should have fallen if I could, and he would introduce me to a particular wife, Fräulein Elsie Giessen."

Three months passed away and, although I saw him I shrank instinctively from him. "I cannot!" he usually wrote to me in my own tongue—and there came another ring more impatient than the strange ideas that in my own mind I looked upon again. I secretly believed that he had made the strange light, there were traces of tears on his hands.

"I am quite prepared to hear that," he retorted. As I look back on what followed, I shudder. I do it to you now. I hope to improve upon my process in that case? Why not do this—this—I don't know that there might be something in it."

I will let her go from me like that? But I cannot say, half-a-dozen hours from the moment that the daylight was fading, staring into the fire and arose and glanced round me. The form of Elsie was a doctor with a good practice; we had known gas which he had made according to a method dis-ishly. "I am going to try it. Come with me, I was a long way behind my friend. He had such cheeks. He entered the hall and shut the door to hundreds of miles away—to give only one instance?"

"Ugh!" I groaned, as there came a violent pull at first. I went to the door and opened it. I started day appliances," he remarked coolly. "Why should I hold advanced notions on scientific subjects, but I would not stay!"

"Yet, I certainly did half expect that you—who believe the theory to be perfectly practicable."

"Dead!" I echoed.

I did my best to conceal my surprise, for this announcement was unexpected; Fritz told me much and a feeling of depression was upon me.

We were seated in my friend's study in a prominent wondering whether I should be called out that room. "Allow me to introduce you to my affianced charming woman that I have ever met. I secretly lay on the couch; but the position was different! "Come in, Horace!" he cried, shaking me heartily shortly afterwards.

"Fritz," I cried, "what is wrong?"

"That is what our grandmothers would have said not exactly know what really did occur. I was deathly pale, his eyes were staring and filled with a no second glance to tell me that she was dead. I uttered a shriek of fear and fell senseless.

"I brought you back," he muttered. "But you have such advanced views concerning the capabilities of science—would at least have admitted each other for about seven years—that is, when he did, I put on my hat and overcoat and followed him. "How can I? The thing is——" I stopped.

"You must—you shall!" he hissed. "Do you think what your process is—before the breath leaves the bosom heave regularly. It was too much! I want your assistance!"

Only those words, over and over again. He was in love with her myself; for she was the most present, having got over my fit of envy very quickly; because I did not wish to intrude upon his happiness.

"Nonsense!" he returned quietly. "I say again, I came to London to finish his studies—for he was a wife and a splendid practice—and I missed the test and failed.

One day I received a note from Fritz, asking me to a ball of rubber which, I concluded, contained the German, whereas I am English.

My housekeeper did not answer the summons and the bell, "It sounds urgent."

"Quick, help me with this!"

When I came to myself, I heard the voice of Fritz some day so that it will be as effective as you say. back in dismay.

"Oh, but your notion is altogether absurd. I call and spend an hour or so with him that evening, covered by himself. I held the ball with trembling keep out the wind and snow ere he replied.

Yes, she lay motionless on the couch and it needed very frequently, the subject was never broached but I kept away from his home as much as possible My friend stood in the doorway. His face was do it alone and you are the only one who can help him as a "crank."

But I shall test my theory at the first opportunity." me!"

"I believe it to be quite possible to restore a dead her beauty. I was recalled to myself by Fritz.

"She is dead—Elsie!" he said hoarsely.

"But," I objected, "why should a person die at all by the hand as the servant ushered me into a cosy was far stronger than I. Scarce knowing what I would have prepared me for what was coming.

The conversation was then changed, and I left him my idea be more impossible than speaking to people were being driven this way and that by fierce squalls, person to life, if the case be taken in hand within, person expires."

"Because it is necessary. I shall not stop to explain this.

The marriage took place a month later and I was mad!

L. E. GIGNEN.

Digitized by Google

Sandy Carmichael.

By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.
Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," etc., etc.

BOOK I.

CONCERNING THE FLIGHT - - - - - - FROM CULLODEN MOOR.

CHAPTER I.

How two Englishmen came to Lochaber: and how they stole and ate black-faced mutton.

THE modern road which leads from Fort William in Inverness-shire to the only two land-tracks which can take one south, runs for the first seven miles or so of its length within stone's-throw of the rocky margin of Loch Aber, or, as it is sometimes called, Upper Loch Linnhe. It is easy to see that pains have been taken to build this road. In some places it is delved from the hill-side; in others, it is laboriously built up, stone upon stone, from the waters of the salt-water fjord below. The road is moderately well kept—that is, small stones are placed in the ruts and holes when they appear, and in the course of time the traffic rolls them down to the normal level; and though "level" is a word hardly applicable to a track which is undulating as a stretch of stormy ocean, level it is on the whole, for none of its many gradients mount to more than twenty yards in height. In fact, it is a road which is very creditable to the region it passes through, considering the very slender amount of traffic which patronises it.

Now this road is distinctly modern. Our ancestors could engineer their roads equally well if they tried—as witness that quaint zigzag yclept, the Devil's Staircase, which connects Glencoe with Kinloch, in the same neighbourhood. But they did not often take these pains over their thoroughfares, and even when the pathway was in any degree elaborate, one trait connected it with the more slenderly kempt tracks. In one and all there was a contempt shown for gradient that was little short of the superb. Wherever there is a hillock, the road is bound to go over it. One would think that the original tracers of the Scotch mountain roads absolutely gloried in crowding them with as many steep places as possible.

It was not till long after "the '45," and the old patriarchal style of clan government had died out, that English money began to flow in and recruit the country's supplies, and the old barbaric civilisation began to be replaced by a civilisation which, if a trifle more effeminate, was at the same time vastly more replete with bodily comfort both for man and beast.

This being so, it need not surprise one to learn that in the year of grace 1745, the south road from Fort William led in an arbitrarily crooked line across the hills, and joined the present one just before one comes to Cuilchenna.

To an eye trained in the niceties of Macadam, the term road would have appeared to be merely a courtesy title. There had been no pick and shovel work done upon it; no powder had been applied to the many outcrops of mother-rock which thrust their sturdy shoulders through the surface; no hammer had attacked even the larger of the boulders. The prevailing shape of the stones upon the road was more or less spherical; and if any showed traces of having been cubes, it was evident that the angles were being rapidly rubbed off them. In fact, a track had originally been made first by men, and then by men and horses, crossing the hills on the same route. Their treadings had worn away grass, heather, and gorse. The peat below became loosened. The constant drizzles and the frequent rains had washed away the loose surface soil. And so, by a simple subtraction, it is easy to see that in time little else but loose and semi-rounded stones would be left.

Digitized by Google

Thus it appeared when, on April 20th, 1745, a couple of travellers topped the last rise, and advanced slowly downwards. One, the elder, sat, or rather crouched, upon a jaded horse, which stumbled laboriously amongst the boulders. The other, a big-framed man of about four-and-twenty, with a three days' growth of black beard over his face, led the horse with one hand, and supported his companion in the saddle with the other. He seemed wearied almost to death, and his high riding-boots and lace-bedizened red coat were stained and splashed till the original colour of each was scarcely anywhere visible. But he was to all appearance still sound in wind and limb. The rider, on the other hand, was obviously wounded; for though no outward bandage caught the spectator's eye, the paleness and limpness of the man told of a grievous hurt somewhere.

A small puff of wind came as they passed the entrance of a tiny gully, and the rider's hat rolled off to the ground, and its owner showed a disposition to follow it. His left knee bent, and his body swayed heavily to the off-side. The younger man caught him by the belt, and steadying him back into the saddle, said, in a voice that had in it a pitiful attempt at cheeriness:

"Now, Major, pull yourself together. We haven't much further to go. The way should be tolerably safe. They are all Lochiel's people hereabouts, and won't lay a finger on us when they know who we are."

The wounded man answered with painful effort:

"You're a good lad — the — the best. But it's no use. I'm smashed all to pieces—inside me. That spill, when my horse came down this morning, made it worse. The ribs are sticking into me like hot skewers: and I'm bleeding, lad, bleeding internally; I can feel it stream out every time I catch a breath—so."

"Don't you scare yourself, Major. You're worth a dozen dead men yet. Of course, you are hurt. Who wouldn't be, after having had a horse pounded into his ribs by a cannon-ball? But remember that, thanks to that butcher Cumberland, you've had a hundred-mile ride at smart pace. Why, I'm pretty nearly as done up as you are, myself; and I haven't got a scratch on me."

"I tell you, Sneyd, I shall be a dead man in twelve hours or less. Remember I've been hurt before, and, one way and another, have learnt enough surgery to know that what I say is true. I don't mind dying. The Cause is lost now—muddled away—ruined because twenty leaders wouldn't pocket their pride and name a chief. I'd be outlawed if I went back to Cheshire, and kick up a host of trouble. But, if they don't see me again, they'll maybe let the poor wife and children alone to enjoy what I have provided for them. So I'd rather die here. The torture of moving is getting more than a man can bear. I should be easier sitting on that heather."

The younger man caught him by the belt.

"I'll help you down if you like, Major," replied Sneyd half sullenly, "but may I be hanged if I leave you!"

"You'll be hanged if you don't go on," retorted the other, with a feeble smile. "They shot every one they could lay their hands on at Culloden Moor, but even Cumberland couldn't make them savages enough to do that now. No, you'll be taken away and tried, and hanged like a sheep-stealer by the common executioner, as an edifying example to your neighbours. Not much delay either. There are certain to be some of 'em close on our heels."

"Then," said Sneyd doggedly, "I'll swing. Wait a minute, Major, till there's some of this heather stuff cut, and then I'll help you off the horse. He, poor beast, looks as sorry as either of us, but he'll be in better plight in the long run, for he's certain to be turned into an officer's stable. I'm glad of it. He's carried me bravely ever since I joined the Prince's colours at Manchester, on that Saturday morning when you presented me to the first Royal person I'd ever seen."

"I'm afraid it's an ill turn I did you then, lad. Had I known as much as I do now, we'd both of us be snugly at home. However, that can't be mended, and, as it was, you did your duty as the son of a soldier like your father should do it. Still, I am superior officer yet, and you must obey orders. Leave me here, and go and save your own ski..."

Digitized by Google

"I've obeyed every order yet, Major, but I'm going to mutiny now. Leave you I won't, and that flat."

"Then, Sneyd, I shall just go on till I tumble."

"Major, look here, we'll compromise matters. D'ye see that little glen over the shoulder yonder? If you can sit the horse till we get there, I'll set you down, and build some sort of a shelter over you. We shall be out of sight of the road there, and when you've rested a bit, we'll make further up into the hills, for you to recruit thoroughly."

Sneyd wheeled the tired horse off the road to the right, and led it across the rough moorland. The going was bad enough, and sometimes the poor beast got bogged almost up to the girths. The heather was rank and strong; the bog-myrtle bushes were many of them four feet high: the peat-hogs were plentiful; the ground was treacherous in the extreme; but Sneyd strode stolidly along, noticing not the black game nor the grouse that he flushed; seeing nothing, hearing nothing, being intent only on bringing his charges to the goal he had pointed out.

When at last they reached it, the gully showed itself deeper than had been anticipated. The elder man had almost lost consciousness. To carry him further would be to kill him. Nothing but an iron will had sustained him thus far. Besides, Sneyd's horse, which his companion was riding, had hardly a leg to stand on, and was holding down its head in most sorry fashion. And so, although the bleak north-easter was cutting up the gully with remorseless chill, and though everything gleamed and glistened with the wet, there was nothing for it but to camp where they were and make the best of it.

Accordingly, the cornet cut a few armfuls of heather, and after laying his companion down on it as comfortably as he was able, set about building a wall on either side of him.

There were stones in plenty, for the small burn which ran down the gully was a most efficient quarryman, and though they were not squared with a mason's niceness, Sneyd's nimble hands puzzled them into position. He built three walls this fashion: and then, raftering them with a few leafless branches of mountain birch, roofed in his hut with heather, turf, and stones.

Night had far advanced before this labour was completed, and, judging that no enemy would be moving about in the darkness, he ventured to get out his flint and steel and light a fire with the branches of a dead birch close at hand. The Major had been dozing for some time; and so, despite his great weariness, Sneyd went off without remark to forage for a meal. He was conscious of having seen fair-sized birds on the hillside, and though, being a south country Englishman, he did not know them to be grouse and black game, he supposed, from their short flight, that they would be easily caught after nightfall. Birds he did indeed find in plenty, for the country abounded with them then more than it does now; but not so much as a feather of one of them could he touch. It is a curious fact that the grouse, although they will not stir for sheep or cattle during the night, are immediately aware of the presence of a man, and call to one another warnings that every poacher knows full well.

His utter weariness prevented Sneyd's quest being a long one. His knees began to totter under him, and he felt that before many more minutes had passed, his legs would refuse their duties altogether. And so he was wending his way slowly back towards the hut, when of a sudden he stumbled upon a sheep sleeping amongst the heather. The animal started to its fore knees, and ducked its head to rise; but Sneyd was too quick for it. He fell across its fleecy back, and forcing it to the ground, opened his clasp-knife, and performed the office of executioner. From sheer inexperience, he did this clumsily; but at last the animal's struggles ceased, and its captor summoned up his remaining powers to drag or carry it to the hut.

The task proved overmuch for him. The ground was too uneven to trail any considerable weight over, and being ignorant of the knack, he could not in his then state progress with the carcass on his shoulders. So, sitting down once more, he took out his pocket-knife again, and started to hack off a leg.

The moon peeped down occasionally at him through a cranny in the tearing clouds overhead, but darkness for the most part prevailed, and his work got on but slowly. The thick fleece, which it had not dawned upon him to skin away, impeded his efforts; and his blunt weapon made but little impression on the mountain sheep's thews and sinews. He had never been a butcher before, and, being city bred, had but little knowledge of butchery. Hence the bone impeded his efforts vastly, for the locality of a joint was unknown to him. So he satisfied himself with cutting off as many lumps of flesh as seemed sufficient to him, and then, staggering to his feet again, all covered with blood, and filthy with brown bog-earth, he made for the hut.

The fire, ill-made, had burnt itself well-nigh out, and after satisfying himself that the wounded man was still dozing, Sneyd set to work coaxing it into a blaze again.

The wood was damp, and as the Scotch mist drizzled heavily, the flame did not spring up rapidly; but at last it spurted out here and there, and he set to cooking his mutton. Being his first essay of the kind, he had small notion of how to set to work; and after toasting the raw flesh on a pointed stick for some time without arriving at any result, he threw the whole bodily on the embers.

Conceiving after a time that, by the look of it, his roast was cooked, he woke the Major, and giving him a lump of the mutton, took another himself. The elder man uttered his thanks, and attempted to eat, but could contrive to swallow very little. The meal was certainly not tempting. It consisted of smoky charred meat and smoky raw meat, with scarcely so much as a trace of the intermediate stage between the two. But Sneyd ate a couple of pounds voraciously, and then, having satisfied himself that his companion's couch was as comfortable as circumstances permitted of, laid himself down and fell fast asleep.

Without, the rain drove down and hissed on the fire; a melancholy wild cat howled; and the high falls of the Ree burn, heavy with spate water, boomed in the near distance. The ground they lay on was spongy with moisture; their clothes were soaked through and through with mud and water; but exhaustion claimed her own, and the young and sound soldier, and the old and wounded one, slept on till the sun had risen high above snow-capped Ben Nevis, and the April morning had warmed to almost summer's heat.

CHAPTER II.

How two fugitives kept house in Lochaber; how Murtagh O'Neill appeared and was received; how the household was again reduced to two; and how these two were evicted by a troop of heavy cavalry.

The morning of the twenty-first of April was, as I have said, well advanced when Sneyd awoke. He found the Major lying beside him in a fitful doze, and noted that his wound had brought on a pretty tolerable fever. Like himself, the invalid must be soaked through to the bone. The rain had turned the floor of their hut into a spongy morass. A hand pressed upon it was covered almost instantly with muddy brown water. An old campaigner would have anticipated this, and have taken measures to avoid it; but Sneyd was young, and had to purchase his experience. However, he was blessed with a goodly store of common-sense, and so, lifting the Major up in his sturdy arms, he carried him outside, and laid him on a springy bed of dry heather in the warm sunshine. Then, returning, he floored the dwelling with stones, and carpeted it with a thick layer of heather. Moss and mud filled the chinks in the hastily-built walls, and by midday the habitation was tolerably snug.

Digitized by Google

Another meal was the next consideration, and how to obtain this he did not exactly know. If any of the troops of his angry majesty, King George II. met him on the prowl for provisions, he was quite aware that they would shoot him down with as little compunction as a keeper would slaughter a stoat or a weasel. The lesson of Culloden Moor, so thought the English king's advisers, could not be burnt too deeply home. And, even had he been prepared to encounter the risk himself, a glance at his helpless companion determined him to be wary. Still, food they must have, for starvation was quite as remorseless a foe as George of Brunswick. Away amongst the hills he would, of course, be safe. One might wander on them for weeks without meeting a living soul. But then, unfortunately, they were more or less barren ground for foraging purposes. They produced no bread, nor potatoes, nor even oatcake; and of the game that lived on them—the red deer and the roebuck, the grouse and the black game, the blue hare and the rabbit—he had as much notion of capturing as he had of catching elephants. With his pistols he could scarcely hit a man at half-a-dozen yards, and a snare was utterly beyond his ingenuity. Add to this, he was feeling knocked up. He woke up tired, and grew more weary as the day wore on; he had a bad cold in the head, and a painful sore throat. Indeed, had he been at home, he would have gone to bed straight away.

But here there was no such thing as bed, or even lying down to rest, to be thought of. Aching bones can receive but little consideration when an empty stomach and a trembling neck claim any marked attention.

So Lawrence Sneyd pondered on the victualling question anew.

Wild fruit he could not expect to meet with at that time of year—even if wild fruit ever grew in the neighbourhood, which he doubted; for the cold, inclement spring air had given him a poor opinion of Scotland as a producer of any of the plants he knew in England. At last, however, he remembered the sheep of overnight. It would not do to take—or, to put it more bluntly, steal—sheep as a regular thing, for sheep usually have an owner, and the said owner is not, as a rule, favourably disposed towards sheep-lifters, whether biped or quadruped. But the particular sheep in question was dead, and to bring home the remains of the mangled carcass would not add to the risk he had already run. So he set off cautiously enough towards the site of the midnight execution, and finding it after some trouble—for it is not given to a raw Englishman to trace his tracks over a Scotch hill without many futile essays—by the omen of a dozen grey-backed carrion crows rising leisurely from a spot that was exactly a gunshot away from him.

He walked up, and saw before him a spectacle that was the reverse of savoury. In the midst of a small patch of open ground, which was trampled into a slough of blood and brown peat slime, lay the draggled remains of the sheep. The feathered scavengers had made the most of their opportunity. Fully one half of what Sneyd had left was carried off. And the much mangled remainder looked far from tempting. But desperate men cannot afford to be dainty or fastidious; and, getting out his knife again, he skinned the carcass this time, eviscerated it, and wrapping what was left in the pelt, shouldered his bundle, and carried it back.

He set off cautiously enough towards the site of the midnight execution.

When he returned, his companion was awake.

"Can I do anything for you?" Sneyd asked.

"Thanks, good lad, no. With this fever on me, water is all I want; and water is close to hand. You've got some more mutton there, I see. Are you going to light another fire?"

"Too dangerous now, Major. We're close to the road, and I saw a patrol pass down it not an hour since."

"But you are very hungry?"

"Dreadfully."

"Then eat the meat raw."

Sneyd shuddered, and pulled a wry face.

"Nonsense; don't be squeamish. It won't poison you. And, besides, saving for the cinders outside, that stuff last night was much as this is. Anyway, eat you must, or you'll break down."

So Sneyd happened to get half-a-dozen morsels of the raw flesh down his smarting throat, and felt and looked all the better for the dose.

The Major refused a share, saying that the fever from his wound prevented him from swallowing a mouthful of anything. After the other had finished his repast, he asked him:

"And what are your plans for the future?"

"Wait till you get on your legs again, Major, and then we'll see. I shall get an adept at this kind of savage's life in a day or two, and shall be able to look after you better. Then, when you've a little strength, we'll move further up into the hills to recruit fully. By that time any pursuit they may have set up will have slackened, and we can move more at our leisure."

The wounded man smiled sadly. "Don't try to deceive yourself or me," he said. "I shall not get over this. All the doctors in the universe could not pull me through. The comforts of my own home could not prolong my life by more than a few hours. The pain is not nearly so acute as it was——"

"There!" exclaimed Sneyd, "you are feeling better already. What else can it mean?"

"Mortification, lad, mortification. Nothing else would deaden it. Now listen. We have ridden right athwart Scotland, by Loch Ness, Loch Oich, and Loch Lochy, because I judged that, being the most unlikely way for fugitives to take, the Elector's men would not guard it with any very scrupulous care. However, the bad luck that

He held him by the throat with one hand, and drew a long, murderous-looking dirk with the other.

banned the Cause, seemed to have stuck to its unfortunate supporters. Four scrimmages did we have on the road, from each escaping by the bare skin of the teeth through your strength and courage; for, as a weak and wounded man, I was able to raise but a nerveless hand in our mutual defence.

"Now, mind, ours was no wild-goose retreat—or flight, if you choose to call it by its proper name. There was a runner current in the army that the Prince's ship La Doubtelle was still lying in one of these narrow lochs; and I satisfied myself that the rumour was not without foundation. He landed close here, from Loch-na-Nuagh in the Hebrides, with Sir Thomas Sheridan, the Marquis of Tullibardine, and the rest of them; and the privateer hoisted in her boats and left them, nominally sailing back for France. But she is said not to have gone. If she is still at her anchor near at hand you will be able to find out the exact locality and join her. The fishermen hereabouts are all well affected to our cause, and will aid you by every means in their power. If, on the other hand, she has left these seas, why, then you must get aboard some other craft. France would be a safe haven for you—France, or almost any part of the continent; and there is always some war going on, where a good sword is well paid for. Or, if you don't like the idea of becoming a soldier of fortune, well, try your luck in the colonies across the Atlantic. Once there, no questions are asked. You pitch upon a plot of land—so I've been told—plant your tobacco, or whatever it may be, have slaves to wait on you, do a little fighting with the Indians every now and then, and on the whole live like a gentleman. There, now, give me another drink of water, and let me have a doze."

That the Major was dying, Sneyd could no longer disguise from himself. The old soldier's once round and ruddy face was white and shrunken, his arm was weak and nerveless, his voice was low and tremulous. His mind alone seemed unimpaired; and, between the intervals of rest, he gave the younger man much shrewd advice for his future guidance.

With such talk as this, during his waking intervals, the elder man spent the day; and the younger, very sick at heart, tended him with every available care, but added little to the conversation. Sneyd was fond of his companion. He had been his "father in arms," and his close friend and comrade throughout the short campaign. Death he was not unaccustomed to. It had been brought closely under his notice in more than one of its always grim forms; he had seen the camp-fire comrade, the billet companion, of one night, lying stark and stiff in his boots the next morning; but to watch this close friend passing away by inches before his very eyes, was a new and bitter experience to him: and he liked it little enough.

Night fell, and when the hours had passed on till no one was likely to be on the road, Sneyd lit a fire once more, and made a more scientific essay at cooking. The result was by no means perfect, but it was better than his last attempt. Still, it was not sufficiently alluring to tempt the Major. He was out of pain now; he had little sensation in any part of his body; and, though retaining all his mental faculties, was so weak that he could scarcely give his thoughts and wishes utterance. Clearly, the end was not far off now. Sneyd saw this, and asked as delicately as he could for any last message or commission.

"I may perchance get through, Major," he said; "and if I do, I'll manage to communicate with your folks at home, if it's possible to do so."

"You are a kind, good lad, but there is no need for you to burden yourself. I left all my affairs in order before I set off. It can do my poor wife and chicks no good to hear when or how I shuffled off this mortal coil; and, if the news got spread abroad, it might do them an immensity of harm. If nothing is said to bring my name into prominent notice, the Elector's people may deem it policy to let matters alone, and stir up no more bad blood. But if, on the other hand, our tale of the last few days was published, they might well style me rebel, attaint me of high treason, confiscate the estate, and turn widow and orphans adrift on a world which would have no sympathy with their misfortunes. So credit yourself with a generous thought and offer, and leave ill alone."

The night wore on, and the wounded man sank by visible degrees. The fire kept burning low, too, as if in harmony with his thread of life; and Sneyd, utterly careless now of who the blaze might bring to their hiding-place, heaped on fuel till the rude hovel was filled with a glare of tawny light. Wood was not abundant. The nearest copse was across the burn, a mile and a half away. But there were stunted half-dead birches sprouting up here and there through the heather, and from these the watcher culled an armful of branches as he wanted them.

On one of these expeditions for fuel, having exhausted the supply in the immediate neighbourhood, he wandered further afield, passing over a spur of the hill, and gaining a hollow that was out of sight of the hut. Black clouds were driving across the sky, and night was so dark that one could just see, and no more. The scene was wild and stormy, and suited to his feelings. He plunged on through the old heather bushes and other rank growth of the moor, slopped through slimy peat-hags, splashed through icy burns, pressing on at a jog-trot, and now and again tripping and falling headlong. The hard exertion tended to deaden his thought.

He discovered one sapling, wrenched branches from it, and was moving towards another close at hand, when his feet stumbled against something soft, lying prone amongst the heather, and he was within an ace of coming down again. For the moment he supposed it was a sheep he had encountered; but when a pair of arms grasped his booted legs, and dashed him rudely to the ground, his senses awoke to the situation.

To grapple with the man was the natural instinct of the moment; and the two of them rolled over and over, crashing this way and that amongst the heather. Sneyd himself was muscular far beyond the average strong man, but his antagonist seemed to possess thews of iron and muscles of copper. Neither spoke, but their breaths came in hot, hissing gasps into each other's faces, and they strove and wrestled for the mastery with the fierceness of desperate men, who think either to kill or be killed.

For long they writhed and struggled, neither gaining more than a momentary advantage; and then Sneyd made a mistake. He loosened one hand, and, drawing it back, drove his clenched fist with full force into his adversary's face. He might as well have hit at a boulder of granite. The skin slid from his knuckles, but the man did not so much as wince. Instead, he threw Sneyd with a mighty effort back downwards on the ground. Then, kneeling upon his chest, he held him by the throat with one hand, and drew a long, murderous-looking dirk with the other.

Digitized by Google

"Cumberland's butcher," he said.

"Cumberland's butcher yourself," retorted the Englishman.

"Ye're English, ye dog! Don't be afther denying it!" cried he who held the upper hand.

"English I am."

"And in the Elector's service?"

"I am Cornet Laurence Sneyd, of Sheridan's Horse."

"Ach!" said the other, "then, if that's the case, I'm sorry for maltreating yez. But for why didn't yez speak out before?"

"You didn't give me a chance," replied Sneyd, scrambling to his feet as the other released him. "And who, may I ask, are you?"

"Murtagh O'Neill, at yer honour's sarvice. Fled from that murtherin' place near Inverness, an' making for County Fermanagh like a cock in the autumn. I've thramped it ivery bit of the way, an' 'tis mortial tired of the game I am. Savin' for a dummy* bhoy that gave me a drink of potcheen fornenst the ould castle yonder, there isn't a sowl that's spoke a civil word to me since lavin' the army. Av it's a dhrop of the hard stuff yer honour's got handy, 'tis proud I'd be to dhrink yer honour's health."

The poor fellow was so unaffectedly glad to meet a friend that, although his flippant talk jarred, Sneyd had not the heart to stop him at once; but, as they walked back to the hut, laden with a goodly store of firewood, he told him how matters lay.

"The poor gentleman!" exclaimed the Irishman. "'Tis cruel hard for him to pass away in this haythen country, with divvle a praste or a bit o' candle to help him on his journey. Sure, it's a powerful bastely place, and sorra a bit of comfort is there to get him anywhere."

By this time they had reached the hovel, and, after replenishing their fire, went inside. The wounded man was lying on his back, with closed eyes. Sneyd signed his companion to silence, and the pair of them sat down with their backs against the opposite wall. The fire without crackled and spluttered, as the warmth from glowing embers below acted upon the fresh dew-drenched fuel above; but by degrees, as these began to heat up and char into flame, the fitful yellow tongues of light became more constant, and the hut began to glow with a tawny radiance. With a constantly eclipsing source of luminance, it is not possible to distinguish objects with any degree of accuracy. The sudden flashes are dazzling, and when darkness supervenes, the eye is not attuned to it: but with a steady light, however feeble, one can, when accustomed to it, see a good deal.

And so when the birch-stick fire was beginning to flare up, Sneyd, whose gaze was fixed upon the Major's recumbent form, commenced to get very uneasy. The Irishman gave certainty to his fears. With a mournful cry, he exclaimed, "Oh Lor', 'tis a corpse we're sitting with!" And then, going across the hut and laying a hand on the dead man's brow, he continued, "The poor gentleman, rest his sowl, is as cowld as a trout. He's been dead this hour."

There was no gainsaying the fact, and though Sneyd had surely expected such an event, the sudden shock of it almost stunned him. He got up and looked at the calm dead face,

The cornet turned away, and the other completed the obsequies by filling in the soil.

* Deaf and dumb man.

Digitized by Google

and then, returning to his place against the further wall, sat moodily silent.

For a while the Irishman respected his trouble, and made no attempt to intrude upon it; but then, after fidgeting uneasily for a minute or so, he inquired—

"Might I ask av yer honour knows that the soldiers are out hereaway?"

Sneyd nodded wearily.

"There's a sthrong pathrol that passed me on the road the evening back; me lyin' in a turf-quag; an' 'tis likely that some of them will be after beatin' up our quarters by daybreak. Bonfires like this ain't lighted by the grouse."

"Then we shall have to clear out."

"Of course, yer honour, an' march widout tuck of dhrum. But it's the poor Major there I was thinking of. By the blessing of God, we'll bury him dacently before we go."

"You're right," said Sneyd, waking out of his mental doze, "we can do no more for him now than that. Come and let us commence at once."

They went out into the open, and choosing the centre of a little mound which lay in the circle of firelight, and seemed the driest spot in the intermediate neighbourhood, they set to work without further delay. The soil, loosened by sword-blade and dirk, yielded readily to shovelling fingers and gouging stone; and, by dint of working with might and main, in an hour's time a six-foot grave gaped before them. Then, reverently wrapping the dead man in his military cloak, they carried the body out, and lowered it down for its last sentry-go.

It was a weird sight—the two stalwart, draggled soldiers, one English, one Irish; the unsightly heap of stones, and soil, and uprooted bushes, round the black, jagged hole; the dark, mysterious moor above, and the flickering yellow fire, that cast grotesque shadows of the whole group into the waste of darkness beyond; and unconsciously its influence made itself felt upon the mourners. Neither spoke. When the body had been lowered down Sneyd muttered a scrap of silent prayer, and the Irishman crossed himself devoutly; the cornet turned away, and the other, without bidding, completed the obsequies by filling in the soil, and piling up stones as a cairn to mark the burial-place.

When all was finished, the bleak grey dawn was beginning to lighten the rugged crests of the eastern ranges. It was the coldest part of the night, and Sneyd, who had been warming himself with exercise, felt the chill intensely. He moved away to the fire, and crouched beside it. Every bone in his body ached. His head seemed ready to split. His throat was intolerably sore. His clothes were sodden through and through. The Major's death depressed him beyond words. He felt dully indifferent to life.

The Irishman was in better plight. Used to exposure from his infancy, the constant damp of the Scotch hills affected him little. The Major's death had been no especial shock to him; and the natural buoyancy of his disposition triumphed over the depressing effect of present hardship. He roasted a goodly supply of the mutton with skilful hand, ate heartily himself, and forced his companion to do likewise.

"I know yez have no heart for grub just now, yer honour, but yez should make yer stomach swallow it against its liking. We should clear out of this soon, an' it isn't me that knows where we'll get our next bite."

So Sneyd forced himself to eat; and then, at his companion's desire, lay down and slept.

O'Neill stamped out the fire, pulled out a pipe and some cake tobacco, and started smoking. The April day was fully alight now, but was cold and cheerless. Every now and again a sleet squall whistled past the opening of the hut, blotting out the landscape; and when the ground around did come into view again it was inhospitable in the extreme. The outlook, both moral and physical, so the Irishman thought, was about as gloomy as ever he had seen it. But, taking this as an additional reason for not allowing his own spirits to drop, he puffed away contentedly, and thanked his stars that at least he had tobacco.

O'Neill urged his companion to increase the pace.

His own vigil had been a long one. Few hours' sleep had visited his eyelids since that hurried flight from the fatal moor above Inverness. But the cornet of horse, in the heavy slumber of utter exhaustion on the damp heather-bed beside him, had more real need of repose, as young men always have; and so Murtagh O'Neill stolidly kept at his voluntary watch without calling for relief.

The hours stole on, and the day grew wilder. The wind hissed passed the hut like a stream of falling grain, boomed in the doorway, and screaming through the crannies, kept the moss that stuffed them in a constant tremulous flutter. Sleet gave place to snow. It was a dusky twilight by twelve o'clock. The Elector's soldiers would never go man-hunting amongst the hills in such foul weather as this. Surely there was no need to sentinel the hiding-place any longer.

O'Neill's drowsy lids strongly seconded the motion. His head drooped further and further upon his chest, erecting itself every now and again, but each time with feebler effort. His pipe still hung loosely from his teeth; but it had been stone-cold for an hour or more. In fact, the poor fellow was more than three-parts asleep.

Suddenly he sat up and knuckled his eyes into broad wakefulness. What had alarmed him he could not tell; but it was something that had sprung every sense into full action. He pocketed his pipe, and then, leaning forward on hands and knees, drew his head to the entrance of the hut. Before him was a trooper leading his horse down by the side of the burn, and looking curiously at the hut. Sleet and snow had effectually quenched the embers of the fire, and from without no one could see what lay inside the dark doorway. Besides, although the snow was melting almost as fast as it fell, as luck would have it, there was a tidy sprinkling of feathery flakes on a heather-bush that lay immediately across the threshold.

The soldier stopped and looked at the scene before him, and then, setting his horse in motion again, moved down the gully, and wheeling round a shoulder to the right, moved off out of sight, but apparently towards the road.

Digitized by Google

O'Neill turned towards his companion, intending to rouse him, but found he was already awake.

"Yer honour saw that blayguard?"

"Yes."

"Then we must march, widout stoppin' to say good-bye to the girls."

"Why move? He didn't see us."

"Axin' yer honour's pardon, but he did. I caught the eyes of him when he tuk a squint this way, an' am sartin he had a flying glimpse of me. But he didn't let on to that same. He's an old soldier, he is, an's not the one to shove his sconce into a wasp's nest, where's there's no honey and plenty of stings, av he knows it. He's gone back to his mates on the road. Whist! There, yez can hear the jangling of their accutriments. Howly wars! There's a throop of them at the laste, an' we'll be havin' the whole rookery about our ears in another minute. Where's yer honour's horse?"

"I haven't seen him since we came here."

"Ach, sure, he'll be down after his victuals on the lower ground. But, faith, we're best without him. We can fut it over the bog faster than a horse can thravel. Come along, yer honour, up we go. It's meself now that 'ud like to see the evictin' party, when they find the tenants have flitted, widout lavin' so much as a turf-creel to raise a trauneen of rent upon."

Moving rapidly up the gully, they had gained the head of it by this time, and were on the point of bearing up the hill to the eastward, when a shout from below told them that O'Neill's prediction had come true. The soldiers had returned in force, and one of their number had just espied the fugitives up near the sky-line.

Half-a-dozen troopers immediately unstrung their carbines and commenced a desultory fire; but the range was long and the aim was bad, and the bullets for the most part whistled past on either side or buried themselves in the flank of the hill. The officer in command saw this, and probably knowing the inaccuracy of his men's shooting of old, bade them cease firing and follow up as fast as they could.

Meanwhile the quarry of these military sportsmen had been increasing the distance rapidly. Sneyd's riding-boots, which reached to mid-thigh, were not adapted to running, and O'Neill, who was shod in shoes, could have out-distanced him easily. But the Irishman adapted his pace to the slower rate, and the two of them pressed forward at a good round trot together.

Whilst they were in the bed of the gully, where the going was only moderately bad, the horsemen gained rapidly; but when they had topped the rise, and got upon ground whose bottom of mingled morass and angular boulder was masked by a rank growth of almost primæval moor foliage, the pace of the pursuers slackened considerably. Two horses fell, and one of them rose with a badly sprung wither; and then another slipped into a peat-hag, and got bogged up to the girths. So their commander gave the order to dismount, and leaving a dozen men, under the command of a sergeant, to guard the horses, followed up the chase with the remainder of his force on foot.

"Yer honour must put yer best foot foremost," said O'Neill, casting a Parthian glance over his shoulder.

"I'm doing all I can," gasped Sneyd. "Are they gaining?"

"They're afther us a-fut, an' the odds is some of the troop will be as fleet as we are. However, a stern chase is a long one, as we used to find at say, an' they're not aboard us yet."

"Have you pistols?" Sneyd asked, after a pause.

"Divvle a wan. No weapon at all, in fact, savin' for this long knife—dirk, I think yez call it—that I thried to drive into yer honour's gizzard overnight. Are them wee barkers in yer belt charged?"

"Yes, but the wet has got at them, I fear!"

"Bad cess to the rain. No wonder these Highlandmen like their whisky nate, when there's such a power of water about. Well, yer honour has a sword, an' we must be content wid that an' the dirk if it comes to a scrimmage."

The soldiers behind had straggled out into a long string with their round-paunched sergeant puffing and blowing in the rear. Save for a half-dozen who were well ahead of their fellows, none of them seemed adepts at running; which was not much to their discredit, seeing that they were trained to fight on legs other than their own. But these six, who were perhaps less bibulous than their fellows—for the trooper of those days was usually a perambulating barrel for potent liquid—these six, I say, hung pertinaciously on the fugitives' track, and, by slow and dogged degrees, gained somewhat.

O'Neill saw this, and urged his companion to increase the pace. "If we can draw away from them for a mile or so," he said, "we shall shake them off for good."

Sneyd was nearly speechless. "Can't—go—an atom—faster," he gasped. "Can't—keep this up—much longer—nearly cooked."

The Irishman, who was trotting along with easy stride, looked glum at this, and a glance at his companion's face showed him that the words were no exaggeration. The cornet was game enough, game to his fingers' ends; but he was out of condition; fatigue had left its trace upon him; his costume ill befitted his present case; and, besides, he was no good runner at the best ofdtimes. Some men aren't; even those who are otherwise goo all-round athletes.

O'Neill's own heels were nimble enough, and, by trusting to them, he could have outpaced the whole crew, and, for the time being at any rate, have got off scot-free. But this did not suit him. He was not the man to desert a comrade at an awkward moment like the present. With him it was sink both or swim both. And so, having decided that speed would not save them, he puzzled his brain as to what strategy would do.

(To be continued.)

Ten Twenty-five Pound Notes Offered Every Week.

As our readers are already aware, PEARSON'S WEEKLY has for some time been offering £5 notes every week. This scheme has proved such a colossal success that the amount has been increased to ten £25 notes.

The conditions, however, are somewhat different, consequently it is necessary for you to read them before applying, as no application will be considered unless it is in strict accordance with the rules and regulations which govern the Distribution Scheme.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Cosmic Experiment.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

Author of "The Last King of Atlantis," "Behind the Barrier," "The Winning of Gunhild," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

"Give Me Twenty-four Hours."

"That is a project to which I have already given attention, and though I have reason to believe that it is possible, I am not in a position to-night to answer without doubt. Give me twenty-four hours, gentlemen, and I will give you my answer—yes or no. For the sake of science I consent to my friend's terms. Here, to-morrow night, I will tell you—yes or no."

A wave of surprise, of incredulity, of half-pity, swept over the faces of the members of the Röntgen Club in conclave assembled, on the evening of February 26th, 1915. Bishop Hearty, who had been breaking a metaphorical lance with the speaker, smiled in conscious condescension. The American stretched out his hand to the scientist and cried:

"Agreed!"

"But understand me," continued Everett, "I accept this preposterous wager only for the sake of science, and in order to silence, once and for all, those antiquated persons who are always holding forth on man's littleness. For myself, I have no care for the 100,000 dollars which our friend Killiker is ready to risk so rashly, and in the event of winning it I shall be happy to hand it over to any charity which the Röntgen Club may decide to be most worthy."

In the event of winning it, indeed! Well might Austin Everett preface his intention with an if, for surely never before was wager suggested on such an issue.

The Röntgen Club, of which I was then a member, was a rather large society, having as its nominal object the investigation and furtherance of the well-known invisible photography, but it had already gathered to itself some of the most unconventional and daring spirits of the ultra-scientific world, and the cathode rays occupied very little of our time.

Everything was discussed in its excellently-appointed lecture room; everything was upheld, criticised, and exploded by turns, and the skeleton shadowgraphs of its members, ranged in a grim, gaunt line round the walls, frowned with changeless stolidity upon the propounding of the most extreme materialistic theories that have ever emanated from the mind of man.

Yet the club was very polyglot, and the ecclesiastic majority of mankind was fairly represented amongst its members; and between these and the compact group of anti-dogmatists, a wordy war was always being waged, which, however, was conducted with invariable good temper.

In the Röntgen Club toleration was an adamant rule, and transgression was the sure precursor of expulsion.

Austin Everett, D. Sc., was the most outspoken and unflinching of the small knot of absolute materialists we had amongst us, and as might be expected, he very often came in conflict with Hearty, our senior churchman. The two were good friends privately, but clubically—if I may coin the word—they were at daggers' point.

This evening, Everett had been showing us some wonderful experiments with a new explosive, (at least, I called it so then for want of a better term) and in his somewhat didactic manner had been holding forth on the support the experiments gave to his theory of the infinite divisibility of matter.

The object-lessons, I admit, were startling in the extreme, though at the time I did not attach to them the significance that came with later knowledge. His crowning illustration for the night was the destruction of a solid sphere of granite inside a large, hermetically-sealed glass tube from which the air was exhausted by a Sprengel mercury pump.

The granite globe was handed round before being sealed in the glass (and as Everett's friend, I know there was no deception in the trick), yet when a tiny puncture was made in the tube with a small drill, and a drop of light blue fluid, almost microscopic in its minuteness, was introduced from the pierced centre of the drill, the solid ball of rock vanished in a streak of dazzling white flame.

When the flame was gone there was no trace of anything whatever in the tube, and almost immediately the glass itself melted away and lay in small round beads on the table.

Digitized by Google

Acknowledging the cleverness of the demonstration, the Bishop had joined issue with Everett, reiterating the time-worn truism that no matter how extensive our knowledge of Nature, a greater Unknown always remains behind. Austin replied to this with, for him, unusual warmth, challenging the Bishop to a statement of the limits of scientific research, and Hearty very confidently instanced the century-old dream of inter-planetary communication.

"Science has not yet made a blade of grass, nor an acorn, nor a wild rose," he said, "but I suppose you will answer that it is only a question of time and patient perseverance; human skill, in my belief, has never yet created life, though your faith in Bastian's experiments leads you to think otherwise, but one thing I can confidently say, your boasted intellect—born, you assert, of inevitable atom-movements—has never done nor ever will. No man has ever yet been able to escape from the trammels of the earth upon which he was born; no man has ever yet been able to communicate in any way with any of the other worlds, and I think no man ever will."

"Well done, Hearty," said Ademas J. Killiker, our rich American, noted for his periods of quiet study and alternative searches after sensation. "I'll back you up in that. I aint much of a Sunday frock-coater myself, as they say in Texas, but I've a heap deep respect for the ancient verities, and I'll wager our friend here 100,000 dollars in good Yankee securities that this problem of interplanetary communication is beyond his power to solve. 100,000 dollars to nothing, gentlemen, and if I'm beaten I'll pay up like a man, without a groan."

We were all more or less excited by this time, though some of us were laughing, but Everett was cool and confident.

"Give me twenty-four hours, gentlemen, and I will give you my answer," fell upon us like a thunderbolt out of the blue.

We crowded round him with eager questions, mixed with a little chaff, but he was invincible to our importunities.

"'Till to-morrow, friends," he said. "'Till to-morrow."

He and I left the club together, and having promised to show him the proofs of an article I had written, in which scientific nomenclature was unsparingly used for the sake of effect, I took the opportunity of going home with him. My curiosity was roused, and for the sake of his daughter Ellen, if for no other reason, I was determined to know whether he had any ground for the acceptance of so wild a challenge, or whether—as I half feared—it was the first sign of a splendid intellect breaking down under the stress of its own abnormal activity. A few words here respecting my friend, will make what follows clearer, and explain my apprehensions.

CHAPTER II.

A Modern Materialist.

Austin Everett was one of the most fascinating people I have met—the most fascinating man with whom I have come in contact. There was a something magnetic, mesmeric in his very presence and bearing, and what the magic of his straight, medium figure, with its head of black hair, and keen brown eyes, failed to gain of your admiration or envy, the brilliancy of his mental powers compelled.

He was, it is true, outside the pale of orthodox science—his frankly untrammelled theories and his denial of the fundamental axioms of the exact school, excited the ire of that circle—but speaking impartially, I can say that his is the master-mind of the world.

His splendid discoveries and marvellous experiments in untrodden paths were shown only to a select few or to the members of the Röntgen, and being one of his most intimate acquaintances I came so thoroughly under the awe-impelling influence of his mind, that mine, notwithstanding a sub-current of weak protest, was moulded much in the fashion of his own, and I professed, at the Club and elsewhere, to be a materialist like himself, or, at the least, to believe that no other theory of the universe so well conforms to the facts of existence as they appear to the trained eye of a logical intelligence.

I say under protest, for constitutionally I am a religious being, clinging to old faiths, old laws, old hopes and fears, and nothing but Everett's semi-hypnotic charm could have held my inclinations in check. Sometimes I would argue with him, bringing forward in turn all the stock theological contents and the latest special pleading of the Christian scientists, sometimes falling back on Pantheism; but I was invariably worsted and beaten on my own ground.

She played one of Mendelssohn's Lieder.

"If you accept Spinoza and Wordsworth, and synonymise God with Nature," he would say, "I cannot contradict you. You simply endow Nature with another name. Call the universe what you will, with that I have no concern. The universe as a fact is unaltered thereby. But when you speak to me of Spirit, Being, Power, Deity, and the like, I must confess that you are using terms which do not correspond to anything within the widest range of my conceptions or inductions. You are using words which you cannot even explain to me yourself—which no one has explained—and I decline to admit such terms into any calculations of mine.

"Religion is an heirloom from the ignorant Past, a souvenir of the ape-like barbarians who projected their own feelings into rocks and trees and sea and sky, and with religion, science has nothing to do. Science is of the Future, her glories are yet to come, her truths have yet to be fully established. I repeat, there is no avenue by which knowledge can come to man save through the channels of his senses, and through these comes no knowledge of anything other than immortal Nature—eternal matter.

Digitized by Google

"Therefore I decline to consider the baseless hypotheses of religion, exactly as I decline to regard the fourth dimension as anything more than a web of sophistry spun out of the cocoons of ill-formed minds."

From that position I could not move him, and that position was characteristic of the man. If in my heart of hearts I knew him to be wrong, I could not deny that on the surface he seemed invincibly correct.

Apart from his notoriety as an exponent of extreme disbelief, he was well known as a painstaking investigator in theoretical chemistry, and as a master of clear English. His "Refutation of Idealism" is itself a supreme masterpiece of analysis, and of his other works, "A Monograph of the Thought Nerves," has given him an international reputation.

His daughter Ellen, a tall, fair girl of twenty-five, was his one human tie. He adored her and she almost worshipped him. Under his training she had grown up in his ideas, though she expressed them differently—more gently, and with some tinge of sentiment infused into their dry bones.

At home, with Ellen occupying the place at table that her mother had once filled, Austin Everett unbent from his stern rationalism, and became as humane as any villa-dweller in St. John's Wood, and it was then I liked him best. It was thus I saw Ellen at her best, too—if she ever had a better mood than her usual brightness—and I think her winsome face had something to do with the frequency of my visits.

Such was Austin Everett—a genius of unparalleled order, whose daring stopped at nothing, who had no thought for Heaven, no care for consequences, in furtherance of his ceaseless inquiries into the how and why of phenomena.

As for myself—I was simply a bachelor of thirty, struggling, with the help of a small annuity left by my deceased parents, to gain a footing in the overcrowded literary world. I had few friends and fewer relatives, and had joined the Röntgen Club solely for the purpose of picking up a smattering of science to embellish my "copy."

The ruse was a success, and my knowledge of technical terms was already becoming commented upon in the reviews.

CHAPTER III.

"My Answer—Yes."

Almost immediately on reaching home that evening, Everett retired to his private study to make some important calculations, and left with Ellen, I had to suppress my impatience and beguile the time with turning over the leaves while she played one of Mendelssohn's Lieder with a soulful touch that thrilled me through.

I did not think the time ill-spent, and must confess that I was rather disappointed when Everett stepped into the room flourishing a paper covered with algebraic signs and equations, and said:

"So far I can see my way clear. I only want to know one more factor in the problem now. Will you mind sending a telegram for me, Millington? It is about this club affair, and very important."

Of course I would oblige, and rose to go.

"Shall you be at the Röntgen to morrow, Miss Everett?" I asked in the hall.

"Yes, Ellen will be there," said her father, putting his hand tenderly on her shoulder. "If, as I believe, I can drive another nail into the coffin of superstitious awe, she will like to be present at the operation."

I took the telegram and saw it clicked off to Neath, Glamorganshire, South Wales, to a Mr. H. Jones. It was very short and threw no light on my mental darkness.

Send me depth of deposit of white ore in vicinity. Forgotten figures. Everett.

I waited for the prepaid answer. It read thus:

Too late to measure borings to-night. Will wire full particulars in morning. H. Jones.

This left me no wiser than before, so there was nothing to do but wait till night.

The club-room was well filled when Everett came in with Ellen, and when he mounted the lecture platform, there was an attentive silence.

The Church party were in full force, I saw, and I noticed near the door some leading spiritualists and a noted Theosophist. I took a chair near Ellen and asked her if she knew what her father's answer would be.

"Yes, I know," she said, "but I should like you to hear it from himself. He is going to speak now."

Grasping the rail of the reading desk with the gesture so familiar to us, Everett stood a moment with his gaze on the Bishop and the American—who sat together—then straightened his well-set figure and plunged at once into the matter in hand, speaking as calmly as though he were dealing with quite an ordinary subject.

"For the benefit of those who were not here last night," he began slowly. "I will run over the incident that then occurred. I gave some of my new experiments, which show conclusively that all substances known to us can be utterly destroyed in a very small fragment of time, and I took occasion at the close to point out how irresistibly the conclusion was forced upon us that everything in Nature is mutable and subject to incessant change, and that only the substratum of which all things are built up is infinite and eternal.

"I then indulged, as at the Röntgen I have allowed myself to do, in a tilt at the various theistic theories of Nature that have come down to us from the darkness of the primeval and the middle ages. Our worthy Bishop took up the cudgels for his faith, and Mr. Killiker capped the climax by offering 100,000 dollars to nothing that I could not solve the problem of inter-planetary communication. I asked for twenty-four hours to consider the challenge, and I am here to-night to answer it."

There was a stir amongst the audience, and we listened breathlessly for his next words.

"Since last night, gentlemen," he went on, "I have worked out my figures and received the information I then lacked, and I have the unalloyed pleasure of telling you that the problem is solved. The puerile theory that the intellect is bound to this planet alone is dissolved into thin air, and to the question whether I can bridge the gulf of space, you have my answer—yes."

There was dead silence for a moment, as he paused. Then he continued:

"But I will be frank with you. At present the scope of my power is limited. I can promise you speedy transit from the earth to any of the planets nearer the sun, but I cannot—yet—go further outwards. I have hopes of accomplishing that result eventually, but an unknown factor in my calculations has so far baffled my skill. Still, to reach Venus, Mercury, Vulcan, or the moon, will, I think, enrich the charities most munificently. Am I not right, Mr. Killiker?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes," said the Yankee, with a less confident smile than he had worn the night before. "I am ready to plank down the moment you prove to me, by actual experiment, that what you say is possible."

"I shall not only prove it to your satisfaction, Mr. Killiker," said Everett calmly, "not only to the satisfaction of the Bishop and all the members of the Röntgen Club, but to the satisfaction of the world. I have thought this matter out thoroughly, and I am prepared to stake my scientific reputation upon the promise that within twelve months from this date the civilised world will know that I have spoken truth.

"The abyss of space need no longer set bounds to man's genius. The worlds need no longer roll on in isolation through the pulsing ether. Gravitation, like its brother, electricity, shall yet be harnessed to the service of man. And in a year—in less than a year—from to-day, I shall have made this promise into a possibility. I need say no more. You have my answer, Mr. Killiker and Bishop Hearty—my answer to your challenge—yes."

No prophet of old ever impressed his followers with the sense of his sincerity and truthfulness more than Everett impressed us that night. A spell, real and powerful, no matter how transitory, fell upon us as he ceased speaking, and the uneasy fear I had felt for his sanity vanished like morning dew before the sun. I felt that he would be able to do what he said.

"Isn't he splendid to-night?" whispered Ellen, her face flushing with pleasure.

But after the first shock of the announcement questions were asked from all parts of the room, and such a babel of voices arose that the bell had to be rung violently for silence. Bets were being offered and taken freely on the result, and a score of impromptu discussions were being waged between the various sects.

"You wish to know the precise nature of the cosmic experiment I propose to make?" said Everett, when order was restored. "That I cannot tell you, except so far as to say that it will alter the Solar System and possibly change the coast lines of the world. To be exact it will occur in eleven months, six days and five hours from midnight to-night. More than this I shall not divulge until such time as I choose. And, gentlemen, that is all I have to say."

To add that the Röntgen Club broke up in unusual excitement, and went to its homes in a highly strung state of mind that rendered sleep fragmentary, would surely be superfluous.

"The papers will be worth reading to-morrow," I remarked, as I said good-night to Ellen and her father. "I noticed some influential pressmen present."

"Yes, and more especially the so-called religious and advanced journals a week later!" laughed Austin, in his quiet way. "But come up after breakfast, and we will look them over together."

Ellen's eyes said "come" unmistakably, and I promised. As I turned away, and the motor-cab rolled off through the slush of the winter's night, I noticed standing unaccountably near to me, a well-groomed Frenchman, who had only recently joined the Club. He bowed hurriedly and walked away, turning up his overcoat collar as he went as though to hide a passing confusion. I thought his conduct strange at the time, but the impression had worn off before I reached my rooms in Upper Sloane Street.

CHAPTER IV.

A Storm of Ridicule.

The papers certainly were worth reading next morning, and we three spent quite a pleasant hour commenting upon them. The social and literary standing of some of our members secured us recognition and column reports in the leading periodicals, and there were editorial paragraphs at our expense by the score. The patronising tone of the daily press came out in all its strength.

Said the ponderous Times:

Hitherto we have found little to deprecate in the doings of the erratic members of the misnamed Röntgen Club, but after the proceedings of last night—which are reported elsewhere—we cannot refrain from asking whether their brilliant genius is of that order which is so nearly allied to madness as to be indistinguishable from it.

The Daily Telegraph was even better.

The arrogance of the modern sceptic (said the paper) grows greater with the growth of science, not because science countenances disbelief, but because, in the face of science's non-possumus regarding the Unknown, materialism has to cry with a louder and more dogmatic voice to make itself heard. Mr. Austin Everett will surely become a very formidable rival to the revivalists if he can draw public attention to his cult by sensationalism every whit as devoid of good taste as that of the Salvation army.

"That is good; decidedly good," laughed Ellen.

The Daily News was astonished, the Mail righteously indignant, the Chronicle jocose, the Post sarcastic. Even the provincial sheets took up the refrain and joined in the chorus of condemnation veiled in satirical regret.

When we were through with them my host smiled good-naturedly.

"It is just what I expected," he said. "It is amusing. But did I not know and allow for the influence of heredity and environment, it would almost make me despair of the ultimate triumph of Truth."

"But the environment is changing, father," put in Ellen, with the flush of enthusiasm. "And in proportion to our power, we can mould its changes to the new ideas, and a step once gained is never lost. Science must prevail in the end."

"It cannot fail," said Everett. "And now I will leave you two to amuse yourselves till luncheon. This experiment will occupy a good deal of my time, and I must get one or two other things settled to-day."

Ellen gathered the papers together with my help, and we arranged them neatly on the bamboo stand in the tree-shaded window. Our hands touched in the process, our heads came near together, and I think that was when I first owned to myself that I was in love with her. I know that the winter sun seemed to have a brighter glow than it had the day before. Suddenly she looked up and asked me quickly—breaking the thread of my thoughts:

"Are you with father in this? Do you really believe he can redeem his promise?"

"You do," I answered. "and why ask me? Two days ago I should have laughed at the idea; now I feel sure that it can and will be done. And so, I think, feel most of the members of the club."

"I am glad of that," she said, regarding me with an interest that was very flattering. "Do you know, Mr. Millington, I sometimes feel very friendless when he is immersed in his calculations. I sit and think how few we unbelievers seem in the world in the crusade against ignorance. It would be so easy to go with the crowd, instead of always fighting Error and using one's time and labour to convince the thankless multitude that Science is their only hope—that the things they love and worship are as truly idols as any images of wood or stone. It would be so easy."

Everett's influence was very strong upon me then, and I felt it was my duty to comfort her for the sense of weariness and loss that, in spite of all, will come at times to those who cast aside the spiritual and try to live by intellect alone, so I said:

"It would be easier, no doubt, but would it be as well? The path of duty is often thorny."

Her face brightened wonderfully.

"Thorny, yes; but the right path after all. You have driven away the cloud."

I do not care to put down more of what we said that morning. I can only say that the hours passed very pleasantly and very quickly, and that an invisible bond seemed to have been woven around us then, binding our destinies together, whose strength nor time nor circumstance has yet impaired.

I was a frequent visitor at the house now, but saw little of Everett for several days, so busily was he engaged in his abstruse studies. Then came the weekly papers and one or two reviews, and the doings of the Röntgen formed food for more weighty disapprobation and hysterical regret. The religious papers, with few exceptions, described the "vaunting declaration" of my friend as being little short of "presumptious," and all deplored the fact that in the nineteenth century a company of otherwise sensible men should have listened to such "balderdash," as the Methodist Times elegantly phrased it; whilst that organ of dissent, the Inquirer, was more severe in its strictures than the Rock. Even "Saladin," that prolific writer of sledge-hammer logic and exquisite verse, declared in his paper, the Agnostic Journal, that:

> The acceptance of such a wager is the sign of an ill-balanced mind. It is only braggart boasting. Though boasting of this kind seems peculiar to that crude of thought yclept "scientific materialism," whose science is only pseudo-science, and whose materialism is only a longer name for that blatant species of atheism so rampant in the eighteenth century, and which has long ago been weighed in the balance of reason and found wanting.

Everett read them all, then leant back in his chair and laughed grimly.

"For all your modern progress," he said scornfully, "your modern man is a very stupid animal. But these good people have done me a service unintentionally. They have given my promised experiment just the publicity it needs to make its success a lever in my hands in the future."

"Don't you think," I remarked, "that it would be well for you to send a letter to the papers shortly, answering your critics?"

"I will write," he replied, after a moment's thought. "The change I shall make is so momentous that the public had better be prepared for it in some measure. A hint I threw out at the Club ought to have led some to guess the nature of my scheme."

"And the experiment is—?" I asked.

"Another time, my friend," said he, putting up his hand, "another time."

With that I had to be content, and filled the next few weeks with utilising to the full the wave of curiosity regarding Everett to tide me still higher on the literary shore. I wrote up an interview with him—with his consent—rushed several articles dealing with novels having inter-planetary travel as their motif, and, for the first time in my career, got into the Spectator.

Ellen said that I was very smart; and even Killiker praised my cuteness—which was praise indeed.

CHAPTER V.

The Paragraph of Promise.

The publishing of Everett's reply evoked another outburst of press ridicule and supercilious doubt even worse than the first, so much worse, in fact, that my scientific friend evinced some irritation and declared that henceforward he would argue with modern stupidity no more.

Yet the letter he sent out through the Press Agency was free from the least suspicion of boasting or insincerity, and it influenced many who read it to believe in the man's ability to carry out his stupendous project. And an inkling of the nature of that project now began to get abroad. I will not give his letter in full, but only its salient parts and closing sentences.

"The time for placing limits to the advance of Science," he wrote, after recapitulating the situation, "is long since past. It is too late in the world's history now to say to the seekers after knowledge, 'thus far shall you go and no further.' It is only childish to stand on the shore of Infinity and bid the rising tide of Science come no higher. Science—which is trained intellect—will stop for no edict of prince, no canon of the church, no mandate of an ignorant mob. No one has ever yet devised means to hold science in check for long; no one ever will.

* * * * *

"I have been asked to re-consider my resolution, if it be a real one; to confess that I have perpetrated a gigantic hoax, if that be true. Confess the latter I cannot, because every word I have spoken in this matter is as earnestly and seriously meant to be taken as true as anything I have uttered in my life. Nor can I alter my decision. Religion and Mediocricy have challenged Science on the physical plane—the plane on which she has won her greatest triumphs—and Science accepts the challenge. My word is given, my reputation is at stake, my mind is firm and I cannot retract. The experiment will be made.

"At last, tardily, some critics have noted that the time I gave as the time of the proof of my statement, was coincident with the date of the next total eclipse of the sun visible in this country, and they have come to the conclusion that I propose, in some way or other, to establish communication of some kind with the moon. That conclusion is correct.

"On the date I have mentioned the world will know that the problem of inter-planetary transit has been partially solved. On that date a large sphere of white metal—equal in bulk to a sphere of iron weighing many tons—will reach the moon from the earth, and the phenomena attending its arrival at its destination will dispel the last doubt that may then be lingering in the minds of the most sceptical. It will be the greatest experiment of modern times; the precursor, I trust, of many more on a larger scale.

"On that date all curiosity will be at an end; till then the most inquisitive must curb their craving for knowledge as best they may. I absolutely refuse to grant another interview, to pen another line for the press, to give another lecture on the subject. Henceforth, I and those friends who are my friends will be as mute as the giant Sphinx that glowers over the hot Egyptian sands.

* * * * *

"But one thing would I say here to those who fear the advance of Science, or hold that her advance should keep pace only with the halting footsteps of the time-worn creeds. To you who have this fear, I say, cast it out, banish it utterly from your minds. There is nothing nobler than the sacrifice of old faiths and cherished ideas for the sake of Truth. It is the climax of altruism. There is no danger in Honesty, in Knowledge, in Truth.

"Man's track through the past is shrouded in darkness, scattered with the skeletons of those slain in the wars of the creeds; his path through the future opens out before us an ever-broadening footway, made pleasant and fruitful by the Sun of Science and the spirit of Truth. Take this ideal to your hearts, then, this noble ideal of unflinching trust in truth, however distasteful at first it may be, and it will grow upon you and enthrall you, and you will find in it, through all your life, a comfort and a hope.

"Have no fear of the ultimate triumph of Intellect. The glory of Nature will not be thereby dimmed, the sacredness of Right will not be thereby weakened.

"Rather will these things be intensified and sanctified beyond measure, for we shall find that in securing the triumph of the human and material over the Heavenly and spiritual that we have laid the foundation of a surer and more unselfish Hope and Faith; a Hope that those who come after us will live in better days and by the light of reason only, and a Faith in Man to realise in himself all those noble and spiritual qualities with which his imagination has crowned its creatures.

"This Hope and Faith it is that has spurred me on to discoveries hitherto passed by, that is my life's incentive, and this experiment I am about to make I regard merely as one effort to bring Hope and Faith before the notice of a scoffing world."

That was his peroration. No wonder the orthodox were disturbed and the second storm of ridicule was worse than the first! Seldom has a champion of such advanced thought obtained so great an amount of public attention.

Our clique at the Röntgen, was, of course, delighted, but one or two members resigned, and there were not wanting people who declared, vindictively, that the whole affair was simply a skilfully planned plot to gain for infidelity that notoriety it ever covets but so seldom receives. At times, I, too, felt dubious, but the bright enthusiasm of Ellen was always potent to lead my mind captive when Everett's mesmeric influence failed.

For a week or two the public interest lasted, and Everett was the man who bulked largest in the public eye, then the excitement cooled down, and before a month was out the affair was nearly forgotten. The unsavoury details of a great divorce suit monopolised the attention of society, and life became more bearable with us thereafter.

I was now a daily visitor at the pretty house in St. John's Wood, enjoying Ellen's smiles of welcome the while I patiently waited to be initiated into her father's secret.

I had not long to wait.

CHAPTER VI.

"I Put You Upon Your Honour."

It had been one of those bright, warm days that sometimes break stern winter's sameness for us, and Ellen and I had strolled down the path to the green arched gate. Under the holly boughs we turned back to the house. On the way Helen suddenly stopped, cutting geometrical figures on the gravel with her cane.

"We are great friends, are we not, Mr. Millington?" she asked, apropos of nothing.

"We are more than friends I hope, Ellen—Miss Everett."

Her question had startled me, and the words were out almost before I knew. She was not offended in the least, nor affected surprise, as so many modern girls foolishly do, but simply looked me in the face and said:

"More than friends, I hope; but still we are great friends, are we not?"

"Yes," I replied hastily, encouraged by her frank confession, and still more by the light that shone in her dear brown eyes. "Friends who have fallen in love, Ellen. You and I were made for each other, dear, why should we live apart?"

As I spoke I seized her hands and drew her to me—we were under the shade of a little avenue of evergreens—and I finished the question with a kiss. She made no resistance, returning it willingly, but it was a pure caress like the kiss of an angel. Then she gently but firmly disengaged herself from my arms and stood apart.

"There is no design in Nature, Dick," she said laughing, "so how could we two be made for each other? Call our mutual liking a coincidence, if you will. No—I have not answered you yet! Give me a little time, Dick, before I say whether I will be your wife or not. Marriage is a contract not to be entered on lightly, on

"We are great friends, are we not, Mr. Millington?"

Digitized by Google

the impulse of a moment, even on the strength of love. There are many things to be considered—age, temperament, health, financial position, etc.—and I should consider myself unworthy of my principles did I not test these matters by the test of cold reason. Give me a little time, Dick—and don't ask me until I let you—and I will tell you my decision. You know my inclination already. Yes, you may kiss me again, Dick; but no more until I give you leave!"

Her logic was unanswerable, and what could I do but obey?

I gave the required promise.

"But still we are great friends, Dick," she persisted. "And that being granted, I want to ask you as my friend to join with father in this scheme, to help him, in fact. That was what I meant to say when you put me off."

"For your sake I will do anything," I said rashly, "but to help Mr. Everett I shall have to know his secret."

"You will know it to-night. He is waiting in the laboratory now, to tell you. Once more for my sake, will you help him with it to the end?"

"If he intends to set the moon on fire, I will help him!" I cried, "if you wish it. Shall I tell him anything of what we have just said?"

"No, sir! I am old enough and intelligent enough, surely, to decide my destiny for myself. I should not be my father's daughter otherwise."

We went into the house together, and going straight to Everett's den, I knocked softly on the door. Even his most intimate friends were not allowed in there without permission.

"Come in," he said, and I went in and picked out an old chair and sat down amidst as strange an assortment of retorts and batteries and electric motors and mechanical appliances and chemical vessels and apparatus as ever I have seen.

There was no order in the room, and while some things were bright and clean with constant use, others were thickly covered with parti-coloured dust of unknown age.

Some of the implements I knew the name and use of, but more were unlike anything else in the world. What attracted my attention was a thick glass box upon a trestle table, in which a small ball of brilliant white metal was slowly rolling.

It was rolling along the under side of the top sheet of glass, very slowly, and as indicated by a compass near, towards the west. By the time I had noticed this it had reached the end of the box and rolled out with a click into one of the upper corners, and there remained suspended.

"A perfect demonstration, just in time!" cried Everett enthusiastically, "you have wanted to know the nature of my discovery—you see it now!"

"But I do not understand," I said, "what has this queer silver ball to do with getting to the moon?"

"Cannot you see?" he asked. "Will this help?"

And he slid the end of the glass box out so as to let the metal ball escape. It went straight across the room and struck the west wall with a sharp noise, and there remained, poised on nothing. The effect was uncanny.

"Still I must confess my ignorance."

"Which shows, I am afraid, Millington, that your scientific knowledge is of a literary kind only—very superficial. You have seen this white ball—which is not silver, by the way—pass through space in utter defiance of the earth's gravitation. You have noticed that it moves to the west only. You have seen that it gathers speed as it proceeds. Cannot you piece the facts together?"

"The sun is very near setting in the west," I said. "You have discovered some means of making this white metal responsive to the sun's attraction only. Still, can't see how that affects the lunar question."

He folded his arms and stood before me.

Everett smiled gravely, stroking his iron-grey beard.

"Have you forgotten the date of my promise?" he said.

"The total eclipse?" I cried. "Then you propose——"

"To take an advantage of the fact that the sun and earth and moon are then in a direct line," he said, finishing the sentence for me. "However, I had better be more explicit.

"This white metal, hitherto unknown, and which I have named electrion is, as you surmise, subject to the sun's attraction only, or to be exact, to the total attraction of the large quantity of electrion which is a constituent of the sun's mass. As every schoolboy knows, magnetism is a specialised attraction distinct from gravitation; the affinity of electrion is a specialised form of magnetism. It is a something as distinct from normal attraction as the Röntgen rays are from the ordinary ether-tremors we call daylight. Given the knowledge, then, that this attraction of the sun is strong enough to move a mass of electrion here—as you have just seen—it is only a matter of accurate calculation and seizure of opportunity to transmit something from here to the moon at a total eclipse."

"But how have you discovered this electrion? And how do you know it exists in the sun? And how prove, that if sent, it will reach our satellite? And how keep this electrion on the earth at all if it is so strongly attracted upwards?"

Digitized by Google

I paused for want of further coherence in my curiosity. Everett walked across the room and placed the white ball in his pocket.

"One question at a time, my friend. I found this metal—at least the ore of it—in a secluded valley in South Wales some months ago. It has taken me nearly all that time to smelt it down and secure the pure element. It is a somewhat difficult process, unique in chemical research, I flatter myself. Its indifference to gravitation, I, of course, could not help discovering when I had once got electrion absolutely unalloyed. There is no credit attaching to me for that. As a little reflection will show you a mass of pure electrion, unless held back by sufficient weights, will rise directly upwards at mid-day, rise in a slanting direction in the evening, and at midnight will have a tendency downwards. The uniformity of these phenomena soon suggested a possible explanation to me, a spectrum analysis put certainty in the place of hypothesis.

"Then you know, by spectrum analysis, as well as by deduction, that electrion exists in the sun?" I cried excitedly.

"I will show you. Come with me."

We went together into the domed shed at the back, where Everett's fine meridian circle telescope pursued the courses of the stars, and he placed before me a photograph of the solar spectrum. Upon this, a medium-sized band of faint colour, crossed by a number of almost indistinguishable dark lines, was indicated by an arrow and the letter E.

"Those are the electrion lines," said Everett, "observed in the spectrum of A Cygni and other stars as well as in that of the sun, and marked 'unknown' on all previous charts. Now see this."

He adjusted a small spectroscope over a tiny electric heating apparatus in which he had placed a few scrapings from the white ball, and presently, as the metal glowed red and dull, and then a brighter white, and became liquid, and finally rose and drifted west in a curling vapour, a definite spectrum was thrown on the receiver.

And exactly in the same position in the spectrum band as the marked lines in the photograph, was the group of dim dark bars of density. The demonstration was complete. I had no doubt now of his ability to "send a sphere of white metal, weighing several tons, from the earth to the moon."

"But how," I asked, remembering that speech at the Club, "shall you prove that this electrion has reached its destination? You surely cannot send a mass large enough for even our best telescopes to make visible on its way through space, or when hidden in some recess of a lunar crater."

He looked at me closely, half hesitating. Then he said, with sudden resolution:

"That, too, is easy now; but before I tell you I must put you upon your honour not to let the knowledge escape you nor attempt to thwart my purpose."

I thought of Ellen and gave my word.

CHAPTER VII.

Proof Positive.

Everett paced the dimly-lighted room once or twice before he spoke. Then he folded his arms and stood before me.

"I shall destroy the moon," he said.

"Destroy the moon?" I cried, horror-stricken. "Impossible! Incredible!"

"Both possible and credible."

"But it is too large," I said, "for any explosive known to man; and too far off. And the consequences?"

"If you will cast your thoughts back to my experiment at the Club on the night of the wager, you will remember that I then showed the working of a solvent powerful enough, if present in sufficient quantity and in vacuum, to destroy the sun himself. The moon is devoid of atmosphere. And have I not just proved that distance is no hindrance?"

"But the consequences?" I persisted. "Will not the destruction of one member of the Solar System disturb the equilibriums which, according to Leverrier, alone prevents the whole from falling together and rushing headlong to ruin?"

"The mere observance of the result will be a scientific treat of rare value," answered Everett thoughtfully, "but I do not think the result Leverrier predicted will follow. To begin with, the balance which he pretended to discover does not exist, his calculations being based upon the utterly false hypothesis that the sun and all the planets are rigid bodies. Still, the sudden displacement of a planet or satellite might precipitate a general wreck of our system."

"And yet you propose to risk that awful possibility?"

"I think not. What I propose is destruction—not displacement. The solvent with which I destroyed a granite ball in vacuum that night I can make in sufficient quantity to dissolve or reduce the whole mass of the moon back again, not merely to its atoms, not merely to the ether, but to the inconceivably minute particles of which the very ether-units themselves are built up. That being so, it is only a matter of smelting enough electrion in a spherical form, inclosing enough of this solvent within it, and setting it free at the right time."

"And when will that be?" I asked.

"The average speed of the electrion sphere on its journey will be very nearly one-fortieth the speed of light," he said, "though, of course, at the moment of impact, it will be much greater. A little figuring, which would only weary you, will show that it must be freed from control exactly nineteen and a half minutes previous to the instant of complete eclipse. At that instant it will strike the moon with inexpressible velocity and be shattered by the shock. The solvent will be dispersed from its air-filled chamber and have full play in the vacuum of space, and the moon, as visible and gravitational matter, will cease to be, will be blotted out of the universe for ever."

I stared aghast at the mental picture, a thousand strange thoughts passing through my mind; a thousand perplexities besetting me. Surely no one but this extraordinary being, heedless alike of God and man in his pursuit of knowledge, could have proposed so stupendous an experiment! Surely no one but himself could have convinced me of his seriousness and sanity in proposing it!

"And this terrible solvent of yours—this destructive liquid?" I asked. "How does it act, and how can you keep it stored in safety?"

"I cannot explain its action thoroughly to you," said Everett, standing with his hand on the door, which had blown ajar, "because I do not fully understand it myself, but know enough for all practical purposes. In my researches into the validity of Dalton's atomic theory—researches which led me eventually to accept the age-old idea of infinite divisibility instead—I penetrated some way into the secret of gravitation, the origin of force, the causes of electric manifestations, and this enabled me to make this atom-destroying compound."

"Its action is instantaneous, like the application of a flame to gunpowder, and in less time than it would take to explode a powder factory, all attractions—gravitational, molecular, chemical and etheric—which hold matter together, can be destroyed. The keeping of the solvent is very easy. It will not act in an admixture of oxygen and nitrogen—such as the atmosphere—and it is only necessary to inclose sufficient air with it in a closed vessel to render it innocuous. Besides being difficult to mix and requiring a long time for preparation, its range of danger on the earth is limited by reason of the air which envelopes us.

"Were any quantity, however, to be placed in a strong vessel and the air to be exhausted afterwards, enough energy would be loosened to work immense damage before the atmosphere could stop its course. A coal-mine, a town—London itself—might be dissolved into pre-etheric substance if enough of the solvent could be buried beneath in airless receptacles. So you see I had good reason for requiring your word of honour."

"A good reason indeed!" I said, shuddering. "It is a terrible knowledge to possess."

"Terrible in some hands, perhaps," he returned. "Useful in mine because useful to Science. But shall I give you a proof of my assertion that I have learnt the nature of that world-mystery, gravitation?"

"By all means," said I. "I do not doubt you, but I must confess to the average man's liking for 'signs and wonders.'"

I noticed something white gleaming behind a holly bush

As I spoke I stepped towards the doorway, which Everett was just passing through, and noticed something white gleaming behind a holly-bush in my line of vision. I looked closer, and for an instant, in the moonlight, I had full view of a human face, with an eager, demoniacal expression fixed upon it, like the glare of a wild beast. I was on the point of calling out to my companion when a cloud sailed under the moon and the face was gone. Everett pooh-poohed the idea of a trespasser in his garden, and though we very carefully went round the holly bush and along the base of the glass-set wall, we found no trace of anyone. He put my impression down to a passing fancy, but though I did not argue the matter out I was convinced that someone had been listening to our conversation with an evil intent, and that that someone was someone whom I knew but whose identity I could not then recall.

Everett went into the house and returned with Ellen.

"I must see this weird experiment," she laughingly said, as I adjusted the wrap more closely round her shoulders. "even if I get a cold in consequence! It is something so much beyond anything father has yet attempted. He is trying to navigate the ocean of interstellar space!"

"And I shall succeed," said he quietly. "It is only a matter of time, though at present I cannot see my way clear to such a happy consummation. I have told you I know the secret of gravitation. It is something like this.

"It is caused by the constant bombardment of all bodies in the ether by the finitesimally small ether particles which fill space. This bombardment, (for want of a better word, I use this term) comes equally from all directions, resulting in the radiation, from each body, of an infinite number of concentric spheres of force, of varying sizes and speeds, whose resistance to the progress of bodies through space is naturally greater as the bodies are far apart and less as they are nearer—'in inverse ratio to the square of the distance,' as Newton said.

"The size and age and form of these great force-spheres—and their consequent energy—must, in the case of every star or body in space, be different, since in Nature there are no two things alike, so that, if we could only trace these subtle ether-thrills to their sources, and construct bodies with surfaces responsive only to some particular thrill, we could send them to or from the star or other source, at our will, irrespective of any other attraction whatever. This I have partially accomplished.

"This roughened sphere I hold is responsive only to the earth-waves of rebounding force, and if I cast it upwards—so—it will travel away from us for ever."

The small thing he threw upwards vanished slowly into the night.

"This other sphere," he went on, "is responsive to some star-wave that I cannot yet localise, but if I cast it away—thus—it will take an oblique direction, inclining to the north. It is travelling now straight to the source of the ether-thrill to which alone it is sensitive."

The tiny object sailed out of sight with tantalising tardiness, rising but slowly as it went. I think that at that moment Everett's strange influence over me was at its height.

"I am satisfied now," I cried. "I will help you in your studies and your experiments."

"And you will not attempt to save the moon from her fate?"

Digitized by Google

"I have given my word," said I.

With that we turned to the house again, and soon after I was speeding to my lonely rooms in a motor-cab, excited and confused with what I had witnessed, but still grappling with the problem of the identity of that white face I had seen in the garden. It was a face, I knew, that had puzzled me before, but do what I would I could not find the link between the present and the past. By the cheery fire that blazed in the grate, I sat and smoked an hour, thinking hard, but memory for once refused to answer my call.

"That night, I recollect, I went to bed in disgust with my mental powers, and passed without regret into the glorious land of strange, wild dreams.

CHAPTER VIII.

Under the Old Oak Tree.

After all these didactic disquisitions and uncanny probings into Nature's inmost heart, a reaction came, and I gave way to the commoner interests of life. I frequented one or two of the non-serious clubs to which I belonged, and wrote "fin-de-siècle" stories and small articles. I took Ellen to the Cinematograph Theatre several times, and gradually shook off the uneasy feeling that the incidents of that night had given me.

Then I threw myself into the work of assisting Everett at his task, which, I soon saw, would occupy the greater part of the year. All the smelting and refining had to be done by him, alone, in his workshop adjoining the observatory. Fortunately, his house was detached, and the back premises surrounded by a high wall, so that the strange work went on with little or no notice from the neighbours.

The delicate chemical operations took all his time, and my duty was the attention to the excavating and conveyance of the white ore in undemonstrative quantities from Wales, the purchase and storing of sundry materials for making the solvent, and the casting of several huge weights to secure our great electrion sphere when completed until we were ready to bid it adieu. All this was new labour to me, but interesting and even romantic, for did not Ellen help me, and did I not see the love-light in her eyes? The time passed very quickly, and the early days of summer were upon us ere we were well aware.

One morning, having very little to do, most of the materials being collected and Everett being busy like an alchemist of yore amongst his fearful and wonderful potions, metals, and retorts, Ellen and I went down by a light auto-waggonette into the country, and ruralised for a few hours round a truly rustic farm.

The day was gloriously fine; one of those rare warm days when the blood courses the swifter in your veins and you are roused to fresh, bright, generous feelings. There was a cheering warmth and freshness in the very air, in the welcome brightness of the increasing sunlight; a pæan of praise in the carols of the birds.

On the short grass lay trees of swaying shadow, banks of white cloud lay peacefully across the blue, a damp haze filled the distant valleys. The bursting buds, the golden jessamine, the early primrose—while yet a few dry leaves lay on the ground—the fields ploughed ready for the sowing, the gardens trimmed and dug, the sunshine showing up the smooth, bare outlines of the unclothed trees, the transparent hedgerows, the few sheep on the hills; all these moved us to a sweet contentment, a blissful forgetfulness of the world of strife and thought we seemed to have left behind.

"It is beautiful here," said Ellen, as we stopped under the branches of a giant oak and looked down a wide and undulating valley. "One could almost forget, here, that evil exists in the world; that work is necessary;

A neat French maid ushered me into a well-furnished reception-room.

that there is disease to fight with, error to combat, death to meet."

"And one could easily think that love and laughter, fruit and song, were all that go to make up life!" I cried. "One could easily forget that wagers must be won, and moons destroyed, for the sake of stately science!"

So we wandered on, idling in earnest and enjoying it withal, despite the advocates of constant toil, and so the day drew to its close, as all days must, and we started back for home. But under the branches of that giant, aged oak we stopped again, and I put my arm round Ellen's waist and asked her for the answer which I divined could not be long delayed.

She looked up into my face archly, not resisting my boldness, and said:

"Is it so long since I promised you to consider my answer—yes or no?"

"It is long when one is waiting, Ellen," I said.

"It has not been long to me," she answered, smiling. "I have seen you most days, Dick, and we have been working in a common cause—and—the time has passed very pleasantly."

"Then you are going to say yes?"

Digitized by Google

"Tell me what you think, Dick!"

"I think you are going to consent to be my wife, to share your life with me as I mine with you, 'until death us do part,' as the old service says. That is what I think, Ellen."

And I kissed her.

"Then you have told me my answer, dear," she said, laughing softly. "Yes, it is quite true. I cannot help say yes."

Then I kissed her again, and I believe—materialist as

A couple of men came in.

I professed to be—that in my inmost soul I thanked God for the joy of that day.

Tired, but content, we rode home through the cooling dusk, and going into the laboratory, where Everett was running a stream of his liquid solvent into a small vat, I put my hand on his shoulder and told him our wish.

He listened as gravely as though I was recounting the success of a scientific experiment of an uncommon order, and simply said, in answer to my query:

"Ellen is a good girl, Richard, and quite old enough to decide for herself. I could wish her no better choice. Let it be when you will, after we have once put this affair beyond doubt."

He turned away to his work in the glow of the red-running fluid, and I beckoned Ellen to come to us and watch the stream of vivid fire. I think that time was the only occasion I ever heard him call me anything more familiar than "Millington."

CHAPTER IX.

In the Clutches of the Anarchists.

It was, if I remember right, just two months before the eclipse that I received a note at my rooms one evening, asking me to meet the editor of a well-known society paper at an address not far from my own in Upper Sloane Street, and to bring the note with me. I thought the request strange, but as the editor was a personal friend of mine and had then some of my work under consideration, I put on my hat and went, not deeming it necessary to leave word where I was going. It was a large house which I had often noticed, and was kept in first-rate style.

A neat French maid ushered me into a well-furnished reception-room and left me. Presently she came again and said, "Would I come this way?" It seemed curious, but still I complied, and was shown into a rather dark, study-looking room at the end of a right-angled passage.

"It was here that M'sieur wishes to speak to you," said the maid, in rather poor English. "He will presently to you come."

The door closed behind her with a queer snap, and I thought I heard other footsteps outside, but soon all was still. M'sieur, whoever he was, seemed in no great hurry to appear, and I grew impatient. Five minutes, ten, fifteen, twenty, passed, and still no sign. I rang the bell, walked about the room, banged the table, knocked on the door, tried it, found it locked, kicked it rang the bell again, and all without response. Everything was silent; there was neither sound of voices nor footsteps. It might have been a deserted house, buried underground, for all I could hear. Even the roar of London's ceaseless traffic found no entrance into that silent room.

After another frantic shaking and kicking of the unresponsive door, I turned to the window. That, too, was secured and bade defiance to my egress. It was strongly rabbeted and its panes were small, iron bars girded it, and the sashes were screwed together from the outside. There was no escape that way. Nor was the outlook from it promising. By a curiosity in the building of the house, it looked out into a sort of deep stone well, reaching from roof to basement and void, so far as I could see, of any break in the stonework save the one I peered through. It was like the oubliette of an ancient castle.

Utterly perplexed at my treatment, I rang the bell violently a score of times, and then I sat down to consider my position. I did not know a single person who had any great grudge against me, anyone whom I could suspect—unless it was some editor whom I had pestered in season and out with doggerel rhymes in my early days—and I hoped that I was only the victim of an unpleasant practical joke.

Still, the uncommon message, the French maid, the locked door, the grated window—these were most suspicious.

I had got thus far in my cogitations when the door was quickly unlocked and thrown open, and a couple of men came in. One advanced to the table, the other closed the door and stood with his back to it.

Both had revolvers in their hands. The one at the door, a short, ugly-featured man, of a Teutonic cast of countenance, I had never seen before; but the other—who stood smiling cynically at me—ah, I had seen him! It was his face I had seen that brief instant in the moonlight in Everett's garden; it was him I had noticed listening when I said good-night to Ellen and her father after the acceptance of the wager. It was M. Marachele, member of the Röntgen Club! He saw that I recognised him, and enjoyed my dismay, showing a fine set of teeth with his broad French smile.

Digitized by Google

"If M'sieur is agreeable," he said sauvely, "we will proceed to discuss the matter to which I am indebted for the honour of his presence. I have, as he will see, taken infinite pains to prevent our interview being unduly interrupted. M'sieur has doubtless satisfied himself upon that point?"

"I know nothing of this nonsense!" I cried angrily "I only know that I have been decoyed here and entrapped in this dungeon. I demand to know the reason for this clumsy trick."

"M'sieur is scarcely complimentary," he coolly returned. "I was rather priding myself on the ruse by which I have secured this conversation. But will M'sieur be again seated? I will ring for wine and cigars if he wishes."

By this time I had taken the measure and character of the two men, and resolved not to precipitate any harm to myself that might be impending. The Frenchman, I felt, was one of these elegant gentlemen who would stick at nothing in his dealings with me, save to pink me off in the most approved fashion, while the stolid German by the door looked like a man who made up in seriousness and sureness for what he lacked in refinement and humour. I was completely in the power of these two men, and must needs be careful. I sat down.

"I will not trouble you to ring at present," I said, "but it would be well if you would tell me the motive you have for this unlawful detention. I have enough respect for my life not to attempt an escape under present conditions," and I glanced at the polished barrels.

"You are sensible," said the Frenchman, sitting down opposite to me; "you face an unknown danger with the true philosophy of a scientific unbeliever. In that I admire you, M. Millington, for I, too, am an enemy of Religion and a friend of Man."

He paused, but I was silent.

"M'sieur has nothing to say? Perhaps his scepticism is only skin-deep, like his science? However, if you will listen, M. Millington, I will tell you why you are here and what we demand as the price of your release. Come and sit here, Stutter, our bird is safely caged.

"It is very little we want, friend Millington," he went on. "Something you can give us without danger to yourself or to your somewhat slender bank-account. We simply want the recipe for making that wonderful and powerful solvent with which M. Everett proposes to destroy the moon."

"Which you will never get from me!" I said.

I sent the German reeling from his seat by a well-planted blow between the eyes.

"That has yet to be seen," he answered with a true Parisian grin as his fingers closed on the trigger of his revolver.

"These little implements are marvellous persuaders, although I have other means of enforcing my request."

"Before I will even consider the request," I said, "I must know for what purpose you require this information. I must know who you are."

"You force me to tell you, then. And once you know, your death becomes a matter of imperative necessity unless you divulge this secret formula. I am M. Marachele, the unsuspected leader of European Anarchism, and I want this solvent to destroy—not the moon, but London. By some means or other I shall eventually obtain it, but unlike many of my comrades, I am a man of peaceful methods, so far as they are possible until the day of the social revolution." This was said ironically.

"And you expect me to assist you in that diabolical purpose?" I cried. "Your pair of consummate villains! I will not tell you anything!"

And springing suddenly from the chair I sent the German reeling from his seat by a well-planted blow between the eyes, and had my hand on the key in the door before he could recover himself. But before I could shoot the lock, M. Marachele's grip was on my neck and the cold barrel of his revolver to my temple.

"One effort more, and I fire," he said.

My hand dropped and I went back to the table. Stutter was on his feet again now, but beyond regarding me with a most malignant stare, was as undemonstrative as before.

Digitized by Google

"One more such attempt, and M'sieur will certainly pass into utter annihilation," said the Frenchman; "at any rate more speedily than he would if he grants the knowledge we so earnestly require."

"Why try to get it through me?" I asked sullenly, trying to temporise. "How do you know that I possess it?"

"I know that, beyond a doubt," he answered, with his most exasperating smile. "I choose you because your life is of no consequence to Science, and will not stop the great experiment. As a lover of Science I have a great desire to see M. Everett's grand demonstration, and I should not like to be compelled to kill so useful a man. Anarchy is already in debt to Science; she will be yet more so in time. Come, M. Millington, let us have your answer after calm thought, for I have another incentive to your consent, of which I have not yet spoken."

"And that is——?"

"If M'sieur will press me," shrugging his shoulders carelessly. "It is this. You are in love with M. Everett's daughter. M. Everett's daughter is at the present moment in my power elsewhere as you are here. If you consent to my terms she will be set free. If you refuse—— I need scarcely say more."

CHAPTER X.

Fencing with Fate.

"You fiends incarnate!" I cried. "You miserable hounds! Your devilish ingenuity is well worthy of the Anarchy you profess; well worthy of the colossal crime you have conceived. But I dare you to do your worst. I refuse!"

I wished my imperturbable foe to lose his temper and do something rash, but it was useless. He simply twirled his waxed moustache and rose to go.

"You are agitated, and do not see the consequences of your decision clearly, M. Millington," he said. "I will not take such an advantage of you. Let me put the facts briefly and plainly before you again. You and your lady-love are thoroughly in my power, but you alone know the secret, and you alone know my true identity. Tell me the formula, and Mdlle. Everett shall be at once set free. Yourself—well, you will be liberated when once the mine is laid that will place London in shapeless ruin. To release you before would be suicidal folly. Refuse, and both yourself and Mdlle. Everett will pay the penalty of death. I can say no more, but I will give you time to consider, to think clearly. I will give you twelve hours. It is now ten o'clock; at ten o'clock to-morrow morning you must decide your fate. M'sieur, I bid you au revoir! Come, Stutter."

They went out, locking and barring the door after them, and I was left alone with my very unpleasant thoughts.

I sat helplessly, I should think for half-an-hour, then I rose and paced the room trying to concoct some scheme with which to defeat the infernal plot. Surely a man was never face to face with such fearful alternatives. If I gave him the required information I was practically delivering the lives of London's millions into his merciless hands; perhaps preparing the way for the ultimate triumph of Anarchy and all that that implies.

I pictured to myself the day of doom for the unsuspecting city—the sudden melting away of the earth beneath in a hundred places as the solvent acted, the houses with their tenants, the streets with their crowded traffic, the great halls and theatres with their audiences, all falling headlong into formless wreck and ruin and dissolving into sightless mist; the soaring tongues of white flame, the desolation, the world-wide panic—and I groaned and clenched my hands, and said that I could not bear the sin of that upon my soul.

Then I thought of Ellen, of myself, and said in my heart that I could not be the cause of Ellen's death, even though a hecatomb of three million lives must pay for her's. And even for myself I shrank from death, life—with Ellen as a central joy therein—was far too bright to cast away, even for that dreamless rest of eternal sleep beyond the grave. In my desperation I grew frantic, and vented my frenzy on the door, the window, the walls, the floor, seeking some means of escape in the grey darkness of that awful night.

But there came no response to my shoutings, no result to my efforts, no sound from the busy outer world, and I sank back, exhausted, despairing, in my chair, as the soft light of four shaded glow-lamps lit up the room with their clear brilliancy.

All through the night the light remained, and at last, worn-out with useless planning and brain-cudgelling, I think I fell asleep. Any-way, I have no recollection of the lamps being extinguished, yet when I noticed the first glow of the dawn creep down the dim oubliette, the tiny filaments within the bulbs were no longer luminous.

I glanced at my watch mechanically; it was half-past six. I set it on the table listlessly and watched the fingers circling round to half-past eight. At that time according to my usual custom, I wound it up, with grim reflection, as I placed it in my pocket, that I might be run down before it was.

Half-past nine. My mind was not yet made up, though a feeling of resignation to coming self-sacrifice was stealing over me. If only I could communicate with Everett!

The two of us could surely contrive some plan to thwart these scoundrels. As I thought of this, a faint hope arose in my mind, a very faint hope, indeed, but a hope nevertheless, and if ever a man put more hard thinking into thirty minutes than I did that morning—In the midst of my plotting the door opened, and my two "friends" of the previous night stepped in. Both carried revolvers again, and after securing the door, both drew chairs and sat down to the table. Stutter was silent as before; Marachele was, if anything, more voluble and affable than he had been at first.

"Ten o'clock, M'sieur!" he said gaily, consulting an elegant gold chronometer. "As you see, I am punctuality itself. I have not kept you waiting the fraction of a second. Yet you looked tired, M'sieur, and you are doubt'ess thoroughly prepared for déjeuner. I beg your pardon a thousand times for my inhospitality, but I feel compelled to get this great question settled without further delay. You will place me under an infinite obligation, M. Millington, if you will answer my question of last night."

I felt that if I was to take advantage of the small, very small loophole of escape that I thought I saw, I must be very careful in what I said. So I replied:

"Before I can tell you my decision, I must know three things more definitely."

"And those are, M'sieur——?"

"First, the precise way you will deal with Miss Everett and myself in the event of my refusal; next,

Digitized by Google

some further guarantee that you have Miss Everett in your power than your mere word; and lastly, some guarantee of our liberation if I consent. I must know these, or I decline to answer at all."

"M'sieur, you remind me of the fly who threatened the spider whose web was round him! But I see no objection to satisfying your praiseworthy curiosity. The guarantee you have of the truth of my assertions is the best assurance that, under the circumstances you have. It is the bond of my honour, my word."

"Your honour!" I said derisively.

"Yes, M. Millington," he said, keeping his temper admirably. "My honour. You have yet to learn that the word of an Anarchist is his bond; that he recognises no other bond; and that that is why he is in an eternal state of rebellion against all other bonds and laws with which the arrogant majority seek to restrain him. The twin principles of Anarchy, my friend, are love and truth, and love and truth only."

"Chiefly love, as evidenced in this proposed crime of yours and the means you are using to accomplish it!" I cried scoffingly.

He did not notice the interruption.

"Then consider," he pursued, "what guarantee more than this can you demand? I tell you, and it must suffice, that I will keep my promise, that you can depend upon my word. If you tell me the secret of the solvent, Mdlle. shall be set free to-day, and yourself just as soon as the fate of London is so assured that your liberation cannot prevent it, nor lead to any detection. You must own, most obstinate one, that this is simply self-defence. As to the other alternative, that is a simple matter. My comrade here, whose only love, whose only religion, is the Cause, will merely present you with certain small spheres of lead that are at present in his revolver, and you will pass abruptly into that state of nothingness which, as M. Everett would tell you, is the common lot of all intelligence in the endless time to come. And with Mdlle. Everett—the same."

"Then I must tell you the secret," I said, with an air of utter dejection.

He elevated his eyebrows slightly and shrugged his shoulders. Stutter coughed, and a sudden gleam of triumph shone in his eyes.

"As M'sieur pleases. He knows the inevitable result of either choice. Here are pen and papers—you will write it down."

Most unfortunately the materials used for the solvent were simple and easily obtained, though costly owing to quantity, so I had to write them down and then hesitate over the means of manipulation.

"I can tell you all but one thing," I said, at length, knitting my brows.

"And that one particular, M. Millington?" queried the Frenchman sharply.

"That one particular is the most important," I said. "It is the exact order in which the bi-sulphates are added to the clear solution. Any other order than the right one would produce a terrific explosion, an occurrence which even an Anarchist would prefer at a distance."

"Is this true?" asked Marachele, riveting his eyes upon my face and abandoning his suave manner. "Will you repeat it, or are you fooling to gain time? Your answer, or I shall try the surer way of obtaining the formula from M. Everett."

"I swear that I have told you the truth!" I said, keeping my voice and eyes steady, though small beads of perspiration stood out on my forehead. "I cannot remember that one point. Neither can I see what it would profit me to waste time, I am so infernally hungry."

"And you propose——?"

"To write to Everett, asking him for the complete formula, telling him that my life and his daughter's depends upon it."

"You are clever, M. Millington, but scarcely so clever as you think. You would put our friend upon his guard. But I must believe you, and perhaps your way is best. You will write a note—at my dictation. You will write this:

"Dear friend.—I am in a position of danger where neither you nor the police can reach me, and the price of my life is the complete formula for your m tter-solvent, together with a small quantity of the pe fected fluid. You must send it by the bearer of this note, asking no questions, or my life will be at once forfeited and your own will be in equal danger.

"Richard Millington."

Having no help for it, I complied, and handed the missive to the sardonic foe. He grinned, passing it to Stutter, who immediately went out, locking the door behind him. I was alone with the most dangerous man in Europe. He took out an elaborately worked cigarette case and presented it to me.

"They are Latakia," he said coolly. "They will beguile the two hours I have given Stutter to bring the reply. He will observe certain cautions, which you will of course perceive to be absolutely necessary in the case for my sake. At present my identity is wholly unsuspected by the omniscients of Scotland Yard, and I prefer it to remain so. Shall I tell you something about myself and the plan I have in mind?"

Affecting a stoical bearing I was far from feeling, I selected a weed and nodded an ungracious assent to his suggestion.

CHAPTER XI.

Necessity has no Law.

Of a truth, necessity has no law, and impelled by that inflexible power, I was busily perfecting the details of what, under ordinary circumstances, would have been a horrible crime. The man whom my plottings were directed against, rattled on unsuspecting.

"As you have no doubt guessed, M. Millington," he said, settling himself easily in his chair, "my membership of the Röntgen Club was simply to add to my knowledge of advanced chemical discoveries. It also tended to support my assumed character of a wealthy man of scientific hobbies. And though I hold the secrets of half Europe's social undercurrents and the lives of scores of well-known men and women in my grasp, there are only nine living persons besides Stutter and yourself who know that I am in any way connected with Anarchy. I am the leader of yearly increasing thousands who have never seen me, never heard my name, never even heard of me at all except as a distant guiding hand, a central brain to the movement, unknown, and because unknown, safe from the most astute spies of the Governments."

"And these ten?" I asked, resolving to learn all I could.

"Each of the ten nationalities of Europe has a chief organiser," he said, "and to these alone my present name and address and disguise is known. M. Stutter is the Prussian organiser, for instance; M. Emile Recluse is the Belgian, the English leader is——"

He lowered his voice involuntarily, and I started at the name I caught. It was that of one of the best known and most popular members of the House, sitting on which side I will not say.

Digitized by Google

"And I am in no danger from these," he continued. "I have not a scrap of Anarchist literature or material of any kind in the house, or about myself, and have never put my signature to any paper in connection with it."

"And now, with your kind assistance, I shall strike my greatest blow at civilisation and democracy. At my instructions London will be placarded with the threat of a vague destruction and an urgent appeal to all Anarchists to leave the city at a given date, about a week previous to the great event. A sufficient number of cylinders, fitted with an exhausting apparatus and half-filled with the terrible solvent, will be buried at convenient places, and presto! the thing will be done. The greatest centre and stronghold of capitalism the world has ever seen will be sent to everlasting destruction."

"And after that?" I inquired, with a feeling of loathing for the man.

"After that, Monsieur. Surely the rest is easy. If London, why not Paris? And after Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Petersburg, and all and every abiding place of power and wealth that will refuse to yield to the summons of the Army of Freedom that will spring up from the ranks of the common folk. And after that? An end of all government, an end of all law, and the beginning of the era of universal Anarchy and brotherly love."

"Such as obtained before laws were made and governments originated, and men ate one another and none could say to them nay—such brotherly love as that!" I cried, revolting at the vista of wholesale murder he so lightly unfolded.

"You are caustic, M'sieur," he returned, with the utmost sang-froid. "You have no philosophy in your nature."

And he relapsed into silence, until, at half-past twelve, the key turned in the lock and Stutter entered, carrying a folded paper and a small package. And looking at his face, on which success was written, I no longer hesitated over the resolve I had formed. If Ellen was to be spared, if London and the world was to be saved from becoming the prey of these human wolves, I must kill them both. There was no other choice; no other sure way.

In a few gruff words Stutter told how he had disguised himself at a comrade's house and then presented my written request at Everett's door; how my friend, after a little futile questioning, had complied with it, begging for news of me and of his daughter, which, the wretch added, with a truly German grin, he had earnestly promised.

I examined the glass phial he had brought, and saw that it contained a mixture of the solvent and manufactured air. So far, so good. I then compared the recipe with the one I had written, and found serious discrepancies. Two entirely wrong substances were included, and the order of mixing was entirely reversed. I deliberately twisted up the paper I had written to relight my half-burnt cigarette, and as its black shreds fluttered to the floor, with the keen glances of the two men fixed upon me, I rapidly thought out my procedure.

It was plain to see why Everett had done that. He suspected more than Stutter thought, and did not mean to give up the precious information without a struggle. Perhaps he would follow Stutter and track him here. Sooner or later. M. Marachele, with his vast secret organisation at his back, would obtain possession of the secret, would take a terrible revenge upon us, even at the cost of a thousand lives.

This spider at the centre of the web of Anarchy must die and his Teutonic comrade with him. With the remembrance of his cold-blooded words fresh in my ears, and the thought of Ellen in my mind, I was absolutely remorseless in my judgment. They must die, these two, and none of their comrades must know by whose hand.

"Well, M. Millington," said the Frenchman, "are you prepared to test this sample in our presence? We are dying to assist."

"Without pleasure," I answered sullenly. "But I shall want a large clear bottle, tightly corked, something small and hard to place inside for the purpose of the experiment, an air-pump, and a small hypodermic syringe. I suppose you have these things?"

"Certainly," said Marachele, "you will have to fetch them, Stutter; the maid's notice expired last night, and she went home this morning. You will find them all in my study."

The German went out, locking the door again; he never relaxed his caution in the least. Marachele, however, thinking I was completely in their power, carelessly walked across to the window, with his hands in his pockets. This act of imprudence was what I was expecting, waiting for. With a bound I sprang upon him and gripped him round the waist from behind, throwing him to the floor. He fell with an oath and a loud cry for help, but my weight was upon his back and I held my grasp like a vice.

"Remember, friend," I said, "you have taken care to make this room sound-proof, and shouting is of no avail!"

He struggled terrifically, but I was more frantic, and any moment Stutter might return. I lifted him bodily from the floor about a foot and then dashed him down head lowermost, with all my force, almost cracking his skull.

"Curse you!" he cried, "you——" but the sentence was unfinished.

I seized him again and battered him on the floor with a madman's strength and fury, stunning him out of all consciousness. Then with a hurried movement I drew the revolver from his coat and overturned the heavy table across his back.

As I stepped to the door, it opened, and Stutter with an armful of articles came in. He saw the evidence of the mêlée, and was about to retreat, but I was too quick for him, and had pulled him into the room and snatched the key from his fingers and locked the door before he could disengage himself from his burden. And then I was ready for him.

"One movement, and I will shoot you like the dog you are," I said.

He growled some guttural Teutonic oath and sprang at me, his hand going to his pocket as he came. I fired point-blank, three bullets in quick succession, and he fell like a log, not killed, but badly hit, and swearing horribly.

"Now, my worthy friend!" I said sneeringly. "You will have to submit to the undignified operation of being bound. My Frenchman is coming to, I believe, and I cannot be troubled with attending to both of you at once."

In a few minutes I had him secured to a chair with the tablecloth, and then I turned to Marachele. He was stirring, though scarcely conscious yet. I moved the table from him and bound him also, then sat and waited his recovery. I had plenty of time now, and no fear of interruption, and before I made an end of the wretches must know where Ellen was imprisoned.

Digitized by Google

Presently Marachele opened his eyes, and their malignant gaze, travelling round the room, and taking in the import of the scene, rested at last upon myself.

"So you have turned the tables upon us?" he said bitterly. "You are cleverer than I thought, M'sieur.

Gripped him round the waist from behind.

Of course you will make an end of us now—even at the risk of a police inquiry and a coroner's inquest?"

"Under usual conditions I should be foolish to kill you," I said. "I should give you up to the law. But as things are, with your secret society at your back to destroy us before we could give our evidence against you, I should be more than foolish to let you live—especially when I have no fear of justice. Have you forgotten the properties of the solvent here? the experiment at the Röntgen with the granite ball? Would any coroner's inquest have discovered the causes of that globe's demise? Are your bodies less easy to dispose of than lumps of granite?"

He started, and his face turned a still paler shade than its present almost deathly hue.

"Malediction! You are a fiend. But get on with your killing and let it be over. At any rate oblivion will be better than this fearful pain in my head."

"I have something to know yet, M. Marachele," said I. "Where is Miss Everett?"

"That I shall never tell you."

"Then I must try Herr Stutter," I said. "I will give you five minutes, Herr, to tell me the address of Miss Everett and how I may rescue her."

The German scowled blackly, darted a swift glance at his chief, and remained silent.

"Come," I urged, looking at my watch, "unless you tell me I will put a bullet through you without scruple. If you will tell me, and other things I may ask you afterwards, I will re-consider your fate. In four minutes now."

"I know nothing of the Fräulein," he replied sullenly, after a pause.

"Three minutes," I remarked.

"I swear I am ignorant," he reiterated.

"Die, then!" I cried, and steadying my nerves, fired. His head fell on his chest. I had taken my first life.

When the smoke cleared away I turned to the Frenchman.

"Perhaps—now—you will tell me," I said. "I promise you the same time and conditions."

"Which you would never fulfil," he groaned scornfully, meeting my gaze with a defiant eye. "You dare not spare me, so make an end of this fooling."

"You refuse to tell me?"

"I absolutely refuse."

There was a gleam of spiteful gratification on his sallow features, and on the verge of my second crime I hesitated. If I gave him an hour's liberty, or even life, how could I be sure, that with his clever brain he would not invent some means of escape, some means of communication with his subordinates? And if he escaped—Anarchy. The fate of the world hung on my hesitation. Yet if I did not know where Ellen was, how long might I not be in finding her? I made one more effort.

"If you will tell me," I said, "and give me the names and addresses of the nine other organisers through whom you work, I will spare you."

He met my desperate ruse unflushingly.

"You dare not," he said. "Your promise is a lie. Again I refuse."

"Then Heaven have mercy on your soul," I cried. And taking aim at his heart with a coolness and precision I could scarcely credit myself with, I fired. He sprang up, lifting the chair with him, then fell back dead.

As the report died away in the awful stillness of that charnel room, there came a loud knocking and kicking at the door, and unlocking it with pistol in hand ready for the worst, I came face to face with—Austin Everett and his daughter Ellen!

CHAPTER XII.

An Appeal.

I made a weak attempt to push Ellen back, but she linked her arm in her father's and resolutely went in. Then, throwing the revolver down, I sank upon a chair and buried my face in my hands, exhausted by the mental strain of the last twelve hours. Presently a soft arm stole round my neck and a sweet voice, that I had scarce dared hope to hear again, whispered in my ear:

"Don't give way, dear. This is terrible but not so terrible as we feared. You are safe, at any rate, no matter what has happened to these two."

"But how have you got here?" I asked. "I thought you were violently detained elsewhere."

"I? I have never been away from home," she said. "What made you think that?"

I had been duped, that was all. I explained, and little by little told them the whole story, not extenuating my double murder in the least.

Digitized by Google

"You have done right, Millington," said Everett, with his usual imperturbable calmness. "Such minds as these are only blunders of Nature in her efforts towards the perfect type of man she will never produce. They are better dead for that reason alone, and when their lives stand between civilisation and chaos the killing of them becomes a duty of the highest order, a duty demanded on behalf of all that is best in humanity."

"And what say you, Ellen?" I asked.

"I say that you have done nobly, Dick," she answered. "I think the crime would have been in leaving these men alive. The law could not or would not touch them, have taken account of a scheme of which only ourselves know the possibility. I love and honour you all the more, dear, for what you have done, even while I regret that you have been compelled to do it."

Those brave words of hers dispelled my last qualm, and I recovered my self composure.

"We have now to obliterate the traces of what has been done, as I intended," I said, and unfolded my plan.

I need not go into further detail here as to how we exhausted the air in the room and then destroyed the bodies and all evidence of their existence by the use of that terrible solvent; how we convinced the landlord that his late tenant had been suddenly summoned abroad and left the house in our hands—which conviction we clenched by paying the quarter's rent and giving a quarter's notice; how we re-papered the room ourselves on the quiet, to hide the effects of the solvent, and how I removed from that dangerous neighbourhood and took better if more expensive apartments nearer to St. John's Wood.

For the rest, the very precautions Marachele had himself taken to hide his identity and isolate himself from all ties was itself in our favour, and after a month's harassing work and suspense, we felt secure. Nor did anything occur afterwards to shake our sense of safety. But I can honestly say that that night and morning of horror added a year to my age, and shook my nerves so badly that they have never been thoroughly sound since.

How did Ellen and her father discover my whereabouts? That is simple enough. They suspected foul play when Stutter brought the strange request, and unknown to that now deceased worthy, followed him as fast as they could, Everett luckily recognising him after he had taken off his disguise on the way back. Ellen would have communicated with the police, but her father determined to sift the matter to the bottom himself first, and after a little trouble with the locks, succeeded in getting into the house.

There was only a month now to the time of the great eclipse, and after New Year's day the snow lay thick and hard upon the ground. I would have liked to sleigh and skate with Ellen, but all our time was now taken up with preparations for the grand coup. As it drew nearer, while her interest and mine increased, Everett's seemed to lessen. He did the routine work in a mechanical way and seemed always in a brown study. He spoke but little at meals, and took long walks alone in the clear, frosty mornings, left Ellen and I much to ourselves, and was altogether too pre-occupied with some subject of which we were ignorant to be a cheerful companion.

But Ellen and I were inseparable. I loved her the more each day I saw her, and our chief topic of conversation, after the usual nonsense that all lovers must talk, to be in the fashion, was the great event. To my surprise, Ellen grew to dislike the idea of it, and all my old apprehensions, allayed at first by Everett's hypnotic spell, revived.

And the nearer the time came, the less we approved of the colossal experiment.

We thought of the complete cessation of the lunar tides, and all that would mean to shipping coasts, and harbours. No tides!—for the solar tides are scarcely perceptible—no rise and fall of the sea! And the storm, the great world wave that would be caused by the sudden stoppage—what of that? In fact so troubled we became that we rose in open rebellion, and appealed to Everett not to send any solvent in the electrion sphere.

He heard us patiently, though his thoughts were with some other subject, we could see, and he answered us gently, but he was firm.

"I have given my word to the world," he said, "and the world shall know that when I speak, I speak in earnest."

"But think of the awful effects of the abrupt stoppage of the great tidal wave," I said. "How it will ruin our harbours and seaside resorts, as well as produce such a storm as will likely wreck everything afloat."

"I have thought of all that," he said, with some asperity; "and I have so little fear of it that I have chartered a steam yacht to take us to the Bermudas as soon as the affair is over, as we were talking last night. The Lady Ellen—a coincidental name, isn't it?—is now being fitted up at Southampton, and I propose that you and Ellen be quietly married the day before the eclipse, and that you start with me for your wedding trip the day after."

"If the yacht is not smashed up by then!" I said. "I must still confess to a fear of the consequences of this rash cosmic venture. I was looking at this scrap of old newspaper yesterday, dated 1896, and this is the damage caused by a sea wave from a simple local earthquake in Japan on June 15 of that year:

"In the prefecture of Aomori, 346 lives lost, 213 people injured, 840 houses destroyed. In the prefecture of Iwate, 23,309 lives lost, 23,340 people injured, 5,920 houses destroyed. In the prefecture of Miyagi, 3,344 lives lost, 1,184 people injured, 715 houses destroyed!

"In place of a local earthquake like that, put a sudden shake of the whole earth and a universal sea-wave, and then think of the frightful death-roll that will follow."

"I do not think your apprehensions will be fulfilled," said Everett, "though, of course, there must of necessity be an unknown factor in a problem of this magnitude. The wave caused by the ceasing of the tides will be a very small one, I am convinced, and will scarcely reach above high-water mark, and then the sea will subside at most places to a point midway between high and low water. The effect I am most in fear of, though so far as my calculations go, it will be a very slight effect, is a probable alteration of the earth's orbit—a nearer approach to a circular path, and consequently climatic changes. But these are only speculations; the experiment must be made before we can reduce them to certainties."

"That will be bad enough," I said, "but still I think you have underrated my previous objection. Just hear what the late Sir R. Ball wrote—almost prophetically—in his Story of the Heavens, Chap. iii:

"If the moon were suddenly struck out of existence, we should be immediately apprised of the fact by a wail from every seaport in the kingdom. From London and from Liverpool we should hear the same story—the rise and fall of the tide had almost ceased. "The ships in dock could not get out; the ships outside could not get in, and the maritime commerce of the world would be thrown into dire confusion."

Digitized by Google

"I do not think matters will be quite so bad as that," said Everett, "but we shall know best when we have seen. The whole future progress of science in the right direction hangs on the success of my project, and the vindication of my theory of the infinite divisability of matter. The moon must be sacrificed for science. After all, it is only a dead world for the sake of a living one."

"But, father," put in Ellen—as a forlorn hope, she afterwards confessed to me—"the moon is not so dead as by common consent she is reputed to be. You know that recent researches at Lick, Paris, and Arequipa have detected a faint twilight on her surface, a kind of vapour in the deep valleys when being lit up by the sun. As long ago as 1876 Dr. Klein discovered a small crater of then recent origin in the plain of Mare Vaporum. And have not great patches of vegetation been observed in Mare Nectaria for years past? Surely, instead of a dead world, it is a world just waking into life."

"I do not care to contradict you, Ellen," said the man of science, smoothing her soft hair with his delicate hand, "but I must tell you that in spite of these discoveries, the moon is a dead world, and will so remain till February 4th, next. The much-debated discoveries of Dr. Klein are open to more than a passing doubt; the vapour seen in the valleys and craters has been conclusively shown to be merely fine steam raised by the sun in the long lunar days from the ice into which the coldness of the long lunar nights has frozen all the water that now remains on its surface. And Dr. Johnstone Stoney has conclusively shown us how and why the true atmosphere of the moon has long ago escaped into outer space. Let me hear no more of this folly, Ellen; science cannot stand aside for sentiment."

"Of course not, father," said she, and the subject dropped.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Eve of the Eclipse.

Surely the sun shone never so brightly in the clear and frosty air of a typical winter day as that morning Ellen and I drove to St. George's and were made man and wife. For that occasion even Everett waived his stern materialism and his reserved manner, and he came with us to the church and gave his daughter away in the most approved conventional style, as though disbelief was a thing unknown to him, and Science and Religion had ever been at peace. As for ourselves, we cared nothing for the error that lay at the back of that impressive ceremonial. The fact that we two stood there with joined hands, and looked into each other's eyes with love, and knew that none could come between us from that day, was enough for us.

We lunched together in town, and after a drive in the park and a farewell to the few friends we had invited to the quiet wedding, returned home.

Everett at once relapsed into his usual reverie whilst busy putting the finishing touches to the white globe of electrion that lay in the workshop at the back.

Its many wedge-shaped segments, cast and fitted with mathematical precision were, all save one, adjusted in their places, and their outer ends formed the periphery of the shining sphere. In the centre, to which access was gained where the remaining section would be placed, were two hermetically-sealed chambers, one almost a perfect vacuum and the other filled with a mixture of that awful solvent and ordinary air.

An air-pump, worked by spring clockwork, connected the two chambers, and, when set in motion, would gradually transfer the air from the solvent tank to the other, and was so timed as to complete its task in twenty-five minutes. Six minutes were thus allowed for sealing up the last section and nineteen for the transit from the earth to the moon. There was sufficient energy latent in that innocent-looking fluid, Everett told us, to dissolve into pre-etheric substance a mass of matter equal in density to one and a half moons.

Ellen's arm shivered in mine as she stood with me, watching the final preparations, but we made no further appeal. We were content in our own happiness, and now that to-morrow would see the greatest experiment that the world had ever witnessed, our curiosity and excitement got the better of our fears.

That night, at Everett's desire—for his money flowed freely for anything connected with his pursuits, although he made no social stir—I sent off a cable message to the principle scientific centres of the world, giving them a brief outline of his scheme, and expressing a hope that they would utilise the precious opportunity of the last solar eclipse in the history of the world to the full. I also sent a note of invitation to Ademas J. Killiker, Bishop Hearty, and about a dozen of our most intimate acquaintances of the Röntgen, to be present at our house the next morning in time for the event.

Then, after assisting Everett to place in position the ponderous lead weights that were needful to prevent the movement of the sun-attracted mass of electrion, we went into the house. Ellen was busy till late packing a few things of her own for our start next day, and it was to a very short and far from restful sleep that we all retired on the eve of the eclipse. The sense of that impending event, which might have momentous events not even Austin Everett could foresee or remedy, oppressed me more than I cared to say.

But Ellen had grown confident and enthusiastic again, and when the first flush of the dawn came, with a clear sky fulfilling our most exacting desires, I, too, fell in with her mood. As I strolled down the garden after our hasty breakfast, a couple of electric four-wheelers, whose drivers looked aggrieved at being abroad so early in such chilly weather, drew up at the gate. Our select party of spectators had arrived.

CHAPTER XIV.

External Contact.

"What do you think of our home-made aërolite, Mr. Killiker?" asked Ellen, as after the usual greetings and the congratulations bestowed upon myself, we adjourned to the garden. "How do you like the workmanship of this little world that is soon to be traversing the wilds of space?"

"I think it's a smart affair," said the American ambiguously, "but I'd own to be an all-fired maniac if I believed that will blow the moon to pieces, as your note suggested, Mr. Millington."

Ademas J. Killiker, I need scarcely say, was sometimes brusque to the verge of impoliteness.

"And you would be right Mr. Killiker," said Everett calmly, as, watch in hand, he stood by the shining globe. "This is simply the vehicle by which I shall convey the fluid that will reduce the moon to pre-etheric substance as easily as it destroyed the granite ball in the glass on the table of the Röntgen Club the night we arranged the terms of this wager of ours."

Digitized by Google

"To be frank with you, Mr. Everett," said Killiker, with a Yankee's inexpressible smile. "I had clean forgotten that little arrangement until last night! But I'm game all through, and I've brought the cheque with me. I have it here."

And he tapped the breast pocket of his coat.

"Then you really mean to say," said the Bishop, turning to my friend, and looking rather scared, I thought, "that you seriously propose to destroy the moon, to alter the order of Nature that God has ordained, to interfere in the workings of the Solar System?"

"Exactly so, my dear sir," said Everett, in a rather superior tone. "Science, on the ceaseless march of her progress, cannot stop for the sent mental considerations advanced on behalf of a worn-out theology. Continent after continent, domain after domain, has fallen under her beneficent sway, and the time has come when the barrier that has hitherto bound her experiments to the earth is to be overpassed. Created or evolved, ordained or grown together of circumstances, no arrangement in Nature shall henceforth be sacred from the moulding hand of science.

"To me has first fallen the power to penetrate the pall of ignorance that surrounds us, to break the isolation that has held us in its bonds of silence through the centuries, and to me shall fall the honour of using that power to its fullest extent. To-day, for the first time in the history of the world—nay, for the first time in the history of the solar system—the gulf of space shall be bridged, and a planet shall be struck from its path and dissolved into utter oblivion."

"Oh!" said the Bishop, rather meekly.

Everett glanced at his watch and made some mental calculations, then put his hand on the lever of the clockwork in the centre of the sphere.

"Yes," he said, as though repeating a lesson he had learnt by heart, "in precisely one hour and thirty-five minutes after external contact, I shall touch this lever and set the mechanism working. Six minutes later I shall release the sphere from its weights, and nineteen minutes after that, at the first moment of total eclipse, it will strike near the central peak of the crater of Copernicus with a velocity that will shatter its solid mass to fragments, setting free the solvent—cleared by then of the air now mixed with it—to do its almost instantaneous work. There will be a bright flash of white flame on the dark ball of the moon, then a denser, utter darkness, and then the sudden sunlight again. The moon will have ceased to exist, and the tides will be no more."

None of us spoke for a time. For myself, I must confess that, somehow, his words awoke no response in my mind, and though the Bishop seemed overwhelmed by the almost superhuman powers that Everett claimed, something in me whispered that neither the destruction of a world nor of the whole system was of any weight in the balance between the eternally conflicting theories of Religion and Science.

The suggestion of the infinite that his words contained dwarfed his great experiment into puny insignificance, and the strong bias of my nature towards the ancient truths, rose up anew within me. The work of his mesmeric intellect, weakened by his refusal to listen to my appeal, was undone at last.

The spell fell from me completely. Where the universe had seemed so plain to my philosophy before, it loomed out indistinct and vast again, though with a glimmering of light and purpose from somewhere far beyond my ken. Only when I turned and looked in Ellen's eyes, and saw therein the reflex of that earthly love, which, after all, alone makes life worth living, did calm grow out of mental chaos, and out of unrest, peace.

"What if some mishap occurs?" broke in Killiker's voice upon my reflections. "Supposing you set the clockwork going too soon, or supposing this awful stuff of yours began to act on the earth now, and dissolved it away?"

"Nothing of that sort will happen, Mr. Killiker," said Everett. "And if it did, what then? Surely we have all read Schopenhauer, and 'The Crack of Doom?' But had we not better be waiting for the beginning in the observatory?"

We crowded in as well as we could, and waited for the darkness to creep on the sun's edge. The focussed image of the luminary glowed awhile in almost spotless roundness on the black screen, and then at the exact moment predicted by the astronomers, the sweep of a dark circle appeared on the edge and slowly advanced upon the disc.

"External contact is now passed," said Everett absently.

The darkness and the silence of the little observatory grew oppressive after we had watched that circle of gloom swallowing up the light for half an hour.

"I say," remarked Killiker suddenly, tired of long stillness. "This destruction of the moon is all very well, but I don't see how it advances the possibility of transit between ourselves and the other planets. To send something to one of them seems possible; to convey passengers would be rather difficult, I guess."

"Not at all, my dear sir," replied Everett. "I should only need to weld a sufficient mass of metal, other than electrion, into my sphere, to reduce its speed to reasonable limits. I could make it hollow and fit it with all appliances for maintaining life for months; make it, in fact, a travelling observatory."

"And how get back to the earth if you arrived at Venus, for instance?" put in another of the party.

"If the atmosphere of Venus is breathable," said the man of illimitable resource, "I could transform my sphere into a body that would be responsive only to the earth's attraction and would carry me safely back."

"And if the atmosphere of Venus was not breathable?"

"In that eventuality," said Everett, "the adventurer would never return."

"Phew!" ejaculated the American; "I kinder guess that sphere will never start with Ademas J. Killiker inside."

"By the way," said one of the others, "I was talking of this affair to M. Marachele about six months ago, and while ridiculing the possibility of anything of the kind, he pointed out with great detail how disastrous the effect would be, particularly remarking how the cessation of the lunar tides would act on the length of the day. As everyone knows, the tides have been the cause of the length of the day being prolonged from four hours to twenty-four, and this process will be enormously slowed down when there is only the slight friction of the solar tides to continue it. He also said that the inevitable outcome of thus leaving the solar tides to operate alone would be the arrival of a time—of course, in the remote future—when the earth would always present one face to the sun as Mercury does; as the moon does to the earth."

Digitized by Google

"By which time science will be able to control the movements of the solar system as easily as it controls the constituents of a gas or liquid," said Everett. "But we will go outside now. It will soon be time to start our globe on its journey."

"Apropos of this," said the other, as we filed through the doorway, out of the darkness into the grey half-light, "has anyone here heard anything of M. Marachele lately? He seems to have left us rather suddenly."

"I have not heard anything of our French friend for some time," replied Everett, looking at me the while with admirable calmness,

The rest confessed an equal ignorance, and neither Everett nor I felt inclined to volunteer further information regarding him.

CHAPTER XV.

The Spurt of White Flame.

The black rim of the moon, the serrations of its hills and valleys silhouetted on the sun, had now crept half-way on the fiery disc. An extra chill came in the air, a breeze sprang up, the light perceptibly paled.

Fortunately, the sky was very clear, only a few faint wisps of haze floating high in the south-east, like the straying tresses of some diaphanous spirit of the starry deep.

Slowly, as we gazed in silence, the dark curve grew, the luminous arc decreased, and out of the dulling sky shone one or two faint dots of light—the planets and the brighter stars. One hour and thirty minutes gone—one hour and thirty five.

"Time," said Everett.

The others crowded round as his fingers touched the delicate lever of the clock-work, and released the remaining section of the sphere from its weights and fitted it in its resting-place. A few turns of three stout screws and it was secure. A minute and a half was yet left to us. The Bishop stepped forward agitatedly, and laid a shaking grasp on my friend's arm.

"If it is not too late, friend, I beg you to yet think twice—to desist from this rash experiment!"

"It is too late!" said Everett, shaking off the grasp with more anger than I had ever seen him manifest before, "and I would not stay it if I could. Cut the ropes Millington, and all of you stand clear!"

As he spoke Ellen passed me the long-handled knife we had prepared for the purpose. Four swift, shearing strokes of its keen edge, and the cords that held the weights together fell asunder, letting them fall. A moment's pause, a gentle rolling motion of the globe, and then——

"She's off!" cried Killiker.

The shining sphere of white rose slanting from the ground, soaring majestically eastwards towards the darkening sun. A second it loomed there, indistinct and vast, betwixt us and the far-off orb, then its size diminished rapidly to a dark spot sunk in immeasurable distance, that passed from our sight with the speed of the swiftest thought. Out of the east, as it vanished, came down a whispered hiss, a prolonged sibilation in the air, like the distant wailing echo of a long-drawn scream of pain.

We looked at each other with faces ashen grey in the twilight of the eclipse.

"What is that?" cried several voices together.

"It is the noise made by the passage of our sphere through the upper layers of the atmosphere at the rate of several hundred miles an hour," said Everett, closing his chronometer with a snap, "and in eighteen minutes the last eclipse will be over."

Not one of us spoke, each waiting in straining suspense for the moment fraught with such tremendous possibilities.

Fifteen minutes more.

The moon was nearly central over the sun now, only a vivid semi-circle of light fringing its inner edge. From behind it the radiant filaments and sheets of the corona began to glow with a pearly light. Arcturus, swung high in the heavens, shone out, with the main stars of Boötes and the Northern Crown, and one or two in Cassiopea, the Lady's Chair.

Twelve minutes—ten minutes more.

The line of sun was thin and bright, like the sweep of a sharpened sickle half-circling the bulking moon. The stellate halo of the corona encompassed it with a growing distinctness and brilliancy, while through its sheets of hazy glow shot here and there long bright streamers of intenser gleam. At the north and south, close on the rim of the sun, the solar prominences blazed out in lurid redness. The sky took on a darker tinge. Venus appeared, more stars twinkled into sight in the Greater Bear and the misty band of the Milky Way, while on earth the silence and dimness of the passing night had something awful in its strangeness. The cocks in the neighbouring back gardens stopped crowing and went to roost, the sparrows ceased their morning twitterings, a canary of Ellen's in the house burst into a quavering song.

Five minutes—three, two.

Surely the eclipse was total now. The body of the moon appeared of an inky darkness, not flat, but like the great black ball she really was. The corona was brighter, the prominences more vivid. Those great red sprays of burning hydrogen leapt in flames a hundred thousand miles long from the sea of whirling gases in which they were born, flickered and sank, and rose again with truly appalling speed. Out of the hearts of fiery tempests that would engulf a world, those flaming prominences darted out, piercing the lighter vapours like tongues of blood; twisting, sinking, rising, at the rate of 200,000 miles an hour.

The sky was now sprinkled with faint dot indications of its constellations of splendour, the air grew icily cold, and somewhere in the distance a dog howled mournfully. "What if, after all, Everett's experiment should upset the balance of the system?" came the thought into my mind.

"In one minute more—in thirty seconds—ten seconds five, one!" counted Everett calmly.

And then——

An instant of utter darkness as the lunar shadow swept swiftly over us—the utter darkness of full eclipse.

Then with a spasm of feeling I cannot describe—a strange admixture of dread, suspense, curiosity, bravado—I saw a dazzling spurt of white flame burst suddenly out from the blackness of the moon's disc, about one third of the diameter from the edge.

Bright, clear, intense, it shone for a moment—a moment in which I could count my heart-beats, and Ellen's as she clung to me—then a dull glow shot out from it in all ways, enveloping the stricken orb. Then it paled, contracted, and was gone. Another moment, and the solar prominences and the fringing glory of the great corona vanished, swallowed into the darkness, and only the stars shone in the black heavens.

* * * * *

Digitized by Google

Whilst I counted a score that awful darkness lasted —a darkness that could almost be felt and heard. Ellen clung closer still to me, and all of us reached out hands to each other in the gloom that had devoured alike both moon and sun.

"What has happened, Mr. Everett?" asked Killiker, in a hoarse whisper. "Is everything going to eternal smash?"

"Not yet, gentlemen," said the man whose genius had shattered a world, speaking in his most cool and confident tone. "This darkness is merely owing to the vast etheric disturbance that has taken place between the earth and the sun. Light being a wave motion of the ether, it is inevitable that such a cyclone of chaos as is now raging where the moon once was should confuse or intercept it on the way. At the same time——"

The sentence was never finished. A cry of relief burst involuntarily from our lips as the pall of the blackness was suddenly rent asunder and the glorious orb of day broke fully into view. The stars shrank back into the depths of heaven, the air grew warmer, the sparrows twittered joyfully again, and the sun, resplendent as a burnished silver shield, shone serenely in the clearness of a perfect winter's day.

"Thank Heaven!" said the Bishop fervently

"That's just my feeling!" cried Killiker.

And it was mine, too. The glamour of my Materialism had worn off in those throes of suspense, and I knew now, that however vaguely, I believed in a Creator behind creation—a something behind the veil.

But with that feeling came another, an undefinable sensation, as of something that was changed around me —something that had happened, but which I could not localise at all. We all felt this and commented upon it, but none of us could assign other reason than that of an intuitive knowledge of some subtle change that the destruction of our satellite had caused. And that the moon was destroyed was beyond a doubt, for there we were in the glare of broad daylight, when the eclipse should have lasted nearly two more hours.

"Well," said Ademas, fumbling in his coat with nervous fingers, "I've lost what I thought the surest thing in creation! Here's your cheque, Mr. Everett, and your hand on the affair."

"And your signed receipt," said Everett, taking a folded paper from his pocket and passing it to the American.

CHAPTER XVI.

To the Tideless Sea.

"Well," said Ellen, after our guests had taken their departure. "I suppose there is nothing more for us to do than to start for the Bermudas—if our yacht is not wrecked by this."

"Waiving that unpleasant contingency, I think we cannot do better than start as soon as possible," I said. "In fact, I ordered a cab from the Motor Depôt to be here at ten. I have thought this matter out, and I should not be in the least surprised, after the message I sent to the scientific world last night, and the events of this morning, if an attempt be made to mob us in our own house. A tremendous amount of damage will very likely have been done along the docks and warehouses of the Thames, and the evening papers will be sure to give full particulars of our share in the result. We had better be getting away."

"I am ready," said Ellen.

"As you wish," replied Everett indifferently, falling into his thoughtful mood again, and standing by the table with his hand on the edge of it, in an attitude so familiar with him at the rail of the lecture desk in the Röntgen clubroom. "As you wish, Millington. I am glad I have got rid of that cheque again to the members, for them to enrich the charities."

"Do you really think the people will be so infuriated, Dick?" asked my wife with some anxiety.

"I am afraid so, Ellie," I replied. "We must get away from England as quickly as we can. Where's my overcoat?"

And my forebodings were not ill-founded. As our luggage-laden auto-cab rattled down the road at ten-thirty, the driver putting on all the speed that it was worth under the impulse of a "fiver," we saw a large crowd surging up in the direction of our house, a typical, angry, London mob, ready for mischief, and evidently under the influence of great excitement. They passed us, however, and I felt relieved when at last we were safely en route on the rail, speeding to the south-west.

A couple of seamen came racing along the sand.

We spoke but little on the way, and I must confess that I felt rather ill at ease regarding the reception we might meet with at Southampton, if our identity were to become known. And in these days of lightning news and hourly editions and profuse illustrations, that was more than likely. However, I tried to re-assure Ellen that we should get through all right, and felt rather more settled when I had drawn from Everett the welcome information that, fearing something of the sort, he had bought the yacht in the name of Arrowsmith.

As the train rattled along, we became aware that an unusually heavy wind was against us. There are tides of the air as well as of the sea, and the sudden stoppage of the lunar aërial tides had provoked a gale. It tore in howling gusts past our windows, jarring the loose frames unpleasantly, drowning our voices with its deafening roar as we swept under bridges and through cuttings; it made the electric locomotive hum and throb laboriously in its efforts to keep headway; so violent, indeed, it grew, that the coaches rocked aud swayed with an appalling motion, every moment threatening to leave the flanged rails. No mishap occurred, however, and at last, with a hoarse shriek of defiance, we thundered into Southampton thirty-seven minutes late.

The platform was a seething mass of humanity, every individual of which seemed to be possessed of one absorbing motive—to secure the next train inland, anywhere. Here and there through the dense crowd the active newsboys wriggled, selling the morning editions of the local so-called "evening" sheets at fancy prices.

"Eve—ning pi—per! Colossal Crime of the Eclipse! Destruction of the Moon! Fearful Storms ragin' on Land and Sea! Wrecks and Damage!" rang their

Digitized by Google

Every Good Nurse Uses and Recommends

HOLLOWAY'S

PILLS AND OINTMENT.

Thousands of Testimonials bear witness to their marvellous efficacy.

They have held front rank during the past sixty years.

The combined use of Holloway's Pills and Ointment will speedily Relieve and Cure RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, LUMBAGO, INFLUENZA, LIVER AND KIDNEY COMPLAINTS, SKIN ERUPTIONS, AFFECTIONS OF THE THROAT, CHEST AND LUNGS.

Manufactured only at 78, New Oxford Street, London; sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
From Rev. J. H. Burn. November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

shrill, high-pitched voices in our ears as we elbowed our way out of the crush and hired a motor-cab down to the shore. I tossed a shilling for a copy and hurriedly glanced over it as we went, Ellen looking over my shoulder.

Of course the news was only telegraphic and teleponic, and therefore fragmentary, but it was terrible enough to inflame the people against us.

From nearly every sea-port in Europe came the tidings that a colossal wave had smashed most of the shipping there, had wrecked sea-walls and forts and piers and docks, and in some cases had flooded and demolished whole streets, with loss of life in every case. Also a terrific hurricane of unusual extent had worked immense havoc, sweeping some districts with the fury of a cyclone, decimating villages, wreck-strewing towns.

At Southampton its force had been greatly moderated for some unaccountable reason, but there, nevertheless, its effects, combined with the sea wave, had been so destructive that thousands of visitors and people of independent means had taken flight inland as fast as the trains could carry them.

In London, over a hundred lives had been lost, and much shipping sunk or battered out of usefulness. A late telegram stated that a large crowd of excited dockers and others had smashed the windows of the Röntgen Club,—which happened to be deserted,—and had then gone on to the house of the man whose rash genius had enabled him to perpetrate this gigantic sin against humanity, with the avowed intention of treating him to lynch law.

"Fortunately for him, and for his daughter and her husband—his accomplices in this unprecedented crime—" commented the sapient journalist, "he had early taken flight, and the mob could only vent its excusable vengeance by looting and wrecking the house."

"Isn't it dreadful?" said Ellen, looking at me curiously. "I never thought it would come to this. Don't you wish we had never had anything to do with this scheme?"

"I do, honestly," I said. "But that's all over now. What we have to do is to get away with whole skins, not caring whether we ever come back or not. I daresay your father will have no regret on that score, and you will only leave your friends; but I," I added bitterly, "I leave behind me a lost reputation; a promising career cut short."

"I know, Dick," said she, "but that is all over now. In some other country, under another name, with me to help you on, you will win back all, and more than all, that you have lost. Have courage, dear."

And right before her father's face she kissed me.

"I have gained more than I have lost already," I said, with a sudden revulsion of feeling, "in gaining you, sweet. But here we are at the shore—it is as desolate-looking a spot as I have ever seen."

Desolate, indeed. The sea was half-way out, and not rippling as its old time custom, but sullenly seething in slow currents and rapid eddies, and strewn with floating wreckage. The wind was blowing great guns out in the Channel, whilst upon the drained sands lay stranded scores of luckless craft, including several fine steamers of considerable tonnage. One of the hotels on the sea front was partially in ruins. Very few people were about the water's edge; kept away, doubtless, by the fear that the worst might not yet be over.

Of this I was glad, and learning by cautious inquiry from an old sailor that one of the few vessels we could see dotting the sea yonder, luckily escaped from the storm, was our own Lady Ellen, we at once walked down to the new shore line and engaged a boat to pull us out.

At the last moment, just as our man was about to push off far enough to float her, a couple of seamen came racing along the sand, shouting at the top of their voices. I had noticed them watching us some time, but had put it down to mere curiosity at seeing anyone venture seaward so soon. But it was not merely that. One of them waved a copy of the evening paper in his hand, and that was enough for me.

"Shove off!" I cried to our man. "We cannot wait! Take no notice of these fellows!"

"Stop her, mate!" cried the foremost. "Them's three of the biggest criminals alive! It's them wot's done all the damage! Stop her, and let's take 'em up the town. It's them, I tell yer, by their pictures here!"

"Take no notice of them!" I shouted in our man's ear. "They are a couple of liars. I will give you a fiver if you will take us out!"

"Times is hard, captin," he said, with a grin. "Make it ten, an' I'd take you out if you was Be-elzebub hisself."

"Ten it is then," I agreed. "Hands off, fellow!"

The nearer of the two sailors had dashed into the water up to his knees and seized the side of the boat. The other was close behind him, and, attracted by the shouting, people were running from all directions.

I seized an oar and struck the grasping hand a heavy blow, he loosened his hold and then renewed it, endeavouring to upset the boat. I struck again fiercely, once, twice, with all my force, and with a howl of pain he let go just as our man caught him with his fist behind the ear. He fell with an oath into the water, and the other, thinking better of his own skin, stopped to assist his comrade to his feet. We were afloat now, and our sailor sprang in and took the oars. We were safe.

No attempt at pursuit was made and, of course, as the crew of the yacht knew nothing of our identity, we were received with due deference and shown to our quarters as the screw began to spin and our prow was pointed for the Channel. I gave the boatman his promised ten pounds, and Everett, saying little, added another five, and he dropped astern very well pleased with his pull.

That night, as the Lady Ellen went spinning merrily down the tideless sea, under the sparkle of the starry sky, we three paced the deck in silence, wrapped in our own thoughts; two of us, at least, enfolded in a deep content. Suddenly Everett roused from his reverie and stopped, remarking with a sigh of relief as though speaking to himself:

"So that is settled."

"The dream of inter-planetary communication?" I asked.

"That is no longer a dream, but an established possibility," he answered slowly. "I have not given any thought to that since we disposed of M. Marachele. The problem which I have solved in my mind these last few weeks is the greater problem of inter-stellar travel. My next experiment will be a journey to one of the nearer stars."

I did not cast any doubt on his ability, nor challenge it with a wager. Nor do I now. I am willing to wait the course of events, leaving them to be guided by a greater Intelligence than his.

And meantime, I have a fresh career to make, and Ellen will be with me and will help me.

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

70 GEMS OF MUSIC 1/- POST FREE.

CHOICE SONGS, Piano, and Dance pieces. Portrait and Coupon for free Gift. New Song List Free. TURNER, London Rd., Preston.

£20

Tobacconists Commencing. Set Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

MANDOLINES.

FINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S,
N CONSTITUTION HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Don't Cough - use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keatings Lozenges

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case. Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers, 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

WESTON'S GRAND

YULE-TIDE

PARCEL OF 1898-99.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR CARDS AND NOVELTIES.

A Magnificent Collection, containing:

1. Twelve assorted designs in new and seasonable embossed floral relief cards; beautiful folding and trifold cards; choice autograph greeting cards, landscapes, &c., &c. A superb packet; quality unequalled; nothing better could be wished for.
2. The latest book of Parlour Games and Evening Amusements, with Forfeits, Conundrums, &c. Revised and brought up to date by Carl Loraine. A really clever work, which will be found invaluable for Private Entertainments, Evening Parties, Christmas Soirées, &c.
3. Our "Concise" Pocket Calendar for 1899, specially prepared for this parcel, with full postal information, standard rule, holiday dates, &c. A neat and handy guide for everyday reference.

The whole forming one of the most unique parcels ever offered to the Public. Suitable for Lady or Gentleman. Send for one at once. You will be delighted. We pay the postage and send the parcel securely packed by return for 1s. 9d.

Prizes for Everybody. See our Splendid Christmas Offer of £250 IN PRIZES.

To purchasers entering the following contests:

1.—A TTSHIC NI EIMT VASSE NNEI.
2.—HNOTSYE SI HTE SETB PILCYO.
3.—TTEEBR TAEL HANT NRVEE.
4.—EEYRV LOUCD AHS A SELIVR NNIILG.

£60 amongst those who solve four. £30 amongst those who solve three. £15 amongst those who solve two. £10 amongst those who solve one

DIRECTIONS.—Re-arrange, to represent well-known proverbs, as many of the above lines as you can. Copy those you find out on a sheet of paper, placing the respective number to each, and post it, together with your order for our "Yule-tide" Parcel and P.O. or stamps for 1s. 9d. and a stamped addressed reply envelope for prize, etc., to ALLAN WESTON & Co., Card Publishers, 188 Strand, London, W.C.

Prizes of £30, £25, £20, £15, £10, £5, ten of £1, twenty of 10s. are also offered, full particulars of which will be sent with the parcel. These prizes are easy to win and well worth trying for. They will not be divided.

CONSOLATION PRIZES.—£10 will be distributed amongst any competitors who fail to secure a prize.

The Competitions will close on Saturday, December 31st, and orders from those participating should be sent in without delay.

The prizes will be despatched on Monday, January 2nd.

Orders will be sent out same day as received, together with a notice informing competitors how many of their solutions are correct.

Remember, every purchaser of our YULE-TIDE PARCEL must win a Prize.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

You will observe that this week I am offering a hundred sovereigns instead of the usual fifty. A sovereign will do much towards helping to cover the expenses incidental to Christmas. All you need do is to write your name and address on a post-card and direct it in the manner laid down in the conditions on page 830.

G. H.—The number of explosive compounds known to chemists at the present time exceeds one thousand. A quarter of a century ago there were less than fifty.

C. T.—Scarlet is the colour used for mourning at the burial of an unmarried woman in Brazil. The coffin, the hearse, the trappings of the horses and the livery of the drivers must be of that hue.

Ele.—The method of artificial respiration employed in drowning cases has proved effective in the resuscitation of several persons who have apparently been killed by electricity, especially in the familiar form of lightning.

A. T.—The air-tight compartment theory in the building of ships was copied from the nautilus. The shell of this creature has a number of cells or compartments into which air or water may be admitted, enabling the nautilus to float or sink at will.

Lena.—Gatwick racecourse was originally a dairy farm, the proprietor of which had an idea that he could pump the milk through pipes to London, and thus save the cost of carriage.

Arthur.—The Swiss post-office conveys anything from a post-card to barrels of wine, scythes, and bundles of old iron.

A.—I don't know of any more wonderful vegetable in the world than the truffle; it has neither roots, stem, leaves, flowers, nor seeds.

F. T.—You have won your bet. Female fish of all species are considerably more numerous than males, with two exceptions—the angler and the catfish.

H. P. P.—So far as I know the stamp duties paid by patent medicine makers show that four millions of pills are taken by the inhabitants of the United Kingdom every week. In France the quantity is about half. Only about one million are taken by the people of Russia. The Australians are the biggest pill-takers in the world.

F. L.—You are late with your invention. A German scientist has succeeded already in propagating sponges artifically. His original outlay was £1, cost of maintenance almost nothing, and a crop of 4,000 sponges as a result.

CONDITIONS OF JUMBLE STORY COMPETITION, SEE PAGE 831.

The lines in the story which will be found on page 831, have been all mixed up. Cut each one out and paste it up where you think it should go. Then write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in their rearranged order. £2 2s. will be sent to the competitor who is correct or most nearly correct, and a copy of the Earl of Desart's "Raid of the Detrimental" to each of the next fifty. In the event of a tie, the prize will go to the first arrivals. Date of closing, Tuesday, December 27th. Mark your envelope "Jumble." The letters in the title and author's name are jumbled, and should be correctly given, and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

Jim. — The brain of man is more highly convoluted than that of any animal in the world. The lower the animal in the scale of intelligence, the smoother the brain.

Lisbon. — On the island of Lewchew grows a tree about the size of a common cherry tree, which possesses the peculiarity of changing the colour of its blossoms. At one time the flower assumes the tint of the lily, and again shortly after takes the colour of the rose.

Wee-wums.—The two astronomers to whom you refer were Chinamen. They were put to death by the Emperor for getting drunk on the night when an eclipse was due.

Peter.—A "size" in a coat is an inch; in underwear, two inches; in a sock, an inch; in trousers, an inch; in gloves, quarter of an inch; in hats, one-eighth of an inch; in a collar, half an inch; and in shoes, one-sixth of an inch.

Gladys.—A hundred tons of cats' tails were recently sold in one lot for the purpose of ornamenting ladies' wearing apparel. Assuming that an average cat's tail would weigh a couple of ounces, this would mean that no fewer than 1,792,000 pussies had been killed just to supply this one deal alone.

Egbert.—(1) A person who has totally lost the sense of hearing in one ear, although he may imagine the defect is of little consequence, cannot locate the direction of a sound to save his life, even when the centre of disturbance is quite near him. (2) I have never heard of flies coughing.

B. N.—The church of Naples, and most other old buildings in that city are infested with mice. The clerical authorities keep a large number of cats in the churches to make war on the rodents, and during the services these cats may be seen walking among the congregation or sitting in front of the altar.

Grace.—In Germany all employers are obliged to insure their workmen, even when the employment is temporary and unpaid.

Patent.—The number of applications for patents filed at the Patent Office every week averages 500 at the present time.

Choo.—A peculiarity of the blind that there is seldom one of them who smokes. Soldiers and sailors accustomed to smoking, and who have lost their sight in action, continue to smoke for a short while, but soon give up the habit. They say it gives them no pleasure when they cannot see the smoke.

Pat.—It is not Dublin but Belfast which is the great tea-drinking city of the United Kingdom. Everybody, high and low, drinks tea of the finest quality. The merits of different brands are a continual subject of discussion, and the stately mansions of tea-merchants, which are rising everywhere in the suburbs, testify to the prosperity of the trade.

G. K. asks: "Is there any instance of benefit resulting from an earthquake?"————The port of Ouzoun Ada furnishes one answer to your query. This port is on the Caspian, and the starting-point of the Trans-Caspian Railway to Samarkand. About three years ago it was visited by an earthquake, and it was afterwards found that the basin was much deeper, which rendered it possible for far larger vessels to enter than had previously been the case.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Dec. 27th, if intended for the Issue on sale Jan. 10th, and dated Jan. 14th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FROM THE OLDEST CYCLIST IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—"During my 18 years' experience I have never been astride a more free and easy wheel than the A.B. It is the best hill-climber I have ever ridden; nothing has ever gone wrong. It is an excellent machine, swift, light, and reliable."—JAMES O'CONNOR, M.P.

FROM WINDSOR CASTLE.—"I am delighted with it in every way."—(AUTOGRAPH TESTIMONIAL), June 22nd, 1898.

FROM A BRITISH ADMIRAL.—"My son is very proud of his machine."

OVER 200 EXCELLENT PRESS NOTICES DURING THE LAST FEW MONTHS.

These Machines have been supplied to Windsor Castle, Buckingham Palace, Admiral Boardman, Her Excellency the Countess Preysing, cousin to H.I.M. The Empress of Austria, a relative of the Prince Regent of Bavaria, Lady Hampson, Sir W. Wiseman, Bart., Sir W. Percival, Bart., etc.

100 BICYCLE PRIZES.

"We have examined the A.B. Cycles, and find them well-made, high-class machines. The firm are thoroughly straightforward."—Cycling, August 6th, 1898.

"Knowing the method on which the A.B. Cycle Company's business is done, we can honestly recommend the firm."—Athletic Record, September 3rd, 1898.

SEND ANSWERS EARLY.

Make up the best sentence you can out of Eight Words, the first letter of each word commencing with a letter of "NEW MODEL" in proper order, thus: "*N*ow *E*verybody *W*ill *M*ention *O*urs, *D*elightful, *E*asy, *L*uxurious."

This sentence is only given as a rough example of what you have to do."

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

We ask you to buy nothing before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office gets the benefit of.

First Prize, £23 A.B. Safety, fitted with A.B. tyres.

A FEW FREE CYCLE WINNERS, each of whom has signed a Solemn Declaration that he or she is in no way connected, either directly or indirectly, with this Firm: Mr. Geo. A. Haynes, 9 Windsor Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Miss Mary Page-Henderson, 8 Lexham Gardens, Kensington, W.; Mr. A. Merrilees, Harvay, Orkney; Mr. Arthur J. Woolnough, 29 Thomson Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. Maria Fraser, Haglefort, Shinrone, Ireland; Mr. Robert Hughes, Llanidan, Anglesey, North Wales; Mr. L. Horne, 101 London Road, Oldham; Mrs. Flora H. Bungay, 170 Railton Road, Herne Hill, S.E.; Mr. R. R. Reed, Crawfordsburn Inn, Crawfordsburn, near Belfast, Ireland; Mr. H. Janes, Booking Clerk (L. C. & D. Rly.), Whitstable-on-Sea, Kent; Miss Myra Williams, 44 Colfe Road, Forest Hill, S.E.; Mr. John Tate, 24 Hanover Square, Bradford; Mrs. R. M. Blazey, "The Ferns," Wymondham, Norfolk; Miss Florence V. Hunnybun, Holton Rectory, Colchester; Mr. Joseph Leith, 20 Taylor Street, Ayr; Mr. J. M. Steward, 6 Guildford Place, W.C.; and dozens of others.

Second Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (12 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (18 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (20 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

☞ TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN and closes Saturday, December 31st 1898. Results will be declared as soon as possible, although it may be a fortnight afterwards before all replies are posted.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Enclose loose stamp for postage of Result of Competition. As so few are able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or for one of our Consolation Prizes if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. One solution only allowed to each competitor. Disregard of this regulation renders any Prize liable to forfeiture.

£100 We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to any ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. It is impossible for any English firm to sell a machine of the highest grade under £15; the material alone costs from £9 to £10, and A.B. Tyres cost an additional £3 or £4.

Mark letters "SHORT STORIES" on top corner of envelope, and address to the Managing Director,

A.B. CYCLE CO. LTD., 59 & 60 CHANCERY LANE, HOLBORN, W.C.

Digitized by GALE

A MAGNIFICENT COMPLEXION

is assured in a few months by using LILLIE POWDER, which is absolutely the finest preparation for the Complexion owing to its Medicinal Qualities. For Gentlemen, after shaving. For Ladies, on the Toilet Table. Removes all Blemishes of the skin.

PRICE
ONE SHILLING.

BY POST
1s. 2d.

Mrs. Langtry, so renowned for her glorious complexion, has for years used herself and recommended the LILLIE POWDER among her friends as being made from her original recipe. We are pleased to say that we have induced Mrs. Langtry to allow us to prepare the Lillie Powder in large quantities in order to cope with the demand which we are confident the Public will put upon it.

Prepared and Exquisitely Scented under the Strict Supervision of HER MAJESTY'S PERRUQUIER, MR. W. CLARKSON.

THREE TINTS—BLANCHE, NATURELLE & RACHEL.

TO BE HAD OF ALL THE BEST CHEMISTS AND HAIRDRESSERS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 522. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 31ST, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

Ask your Draper for

HOYLE'S

LOOK FOR THIS STAMP ON EACH PIECE

THOMAS HOYLE & SONS LIMITED REGD TRADE MARK MANCHESTER

NEW SEASON'S DESIGNS NOW READY

PRINTS

WARRANTED FAST COLOURS

4/6 Complete. ACETYLENE CYCLE LAMPS

FOR XMAS PRESENTS.

5,000 First-class Silver Plated Carbide Gas Lamps, the most simple yet invented, perfectly safe, are so constructed that it is impossible for them to explode. Giving a 500 Candle-power Light. To be sold at the low price of 4/6 each; postage 3d. extra.

As this offer cannot be repeated, orders will be executed in strict rotation.

SEND YOUR ORDER AT ONCE SO AS NOT TO BE DISAPPOINTED.

THE UNIVERSAL ADVERTISING AGENCY,

53 Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Nervous Indigestion:

The Symptoms of Nervous Indigestion are well marked. They are Pain after Food, Severe Headache, Coated Tongue, Constipation, Flatulence, Loss of Appetite, Pallor, Nervous Twitchings, Sleeplessness, Loss of Flesh and Strength, and great Prostration of Mind and Body.

The Patient will be Well Advised to take a short course of Guy's Tonic. This useful Medicine never fails to restore the flagging "Powers of Life," create Appetite, ensure good Digestion and Assimilation, and thus invigorate and strengthen the entire System.

"Could Not Work or Sleep."

Miss CLARA ROBSON, of Warren Lodge, Hampton Wick, writes:

"Having suffered with Indigestion for some years, "and finding doctors did not do me much good, I "thought I would try Guy's Tonic. By the time I "had taken one bottle I found I could take almost "any kind of Food. I did not know previously "whatever to do, I was in such great pain. I could "not work or sleep; but since I have taken Guy's "Tonic I can enjoy all my meals, and I feel that it "is a pleasure to work; in fact, I do not feel like "the same person. I shall always be most pleased "to recommend Guy's Tonic."

"Appetite Increased."

"Ipswich.

"Miss COCKSEDGE has much pleasure in highly "recommending Guy's Tonic as a Remedy for "Weakness and Debility. The Tonic gives an "increase of Appetite and a general feeling of "Elasticity and Strength to the System."

The Reason why Guy's Tonic is so beneficial is not far to seek. It reinforces the Gastric Juice and tones the digestive Organs, so that all food taken is efficiently digested and assimilated. The full nourishment is then derived for the strengthening and building up of the Nerves and Tissues. Health and Energy follow as a matter of course.

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1/1½, is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

You'll Tide

OVER

Yule Tide

FESTIVITIES

Without any distressing symptoms arising through over-indulgence

BY TAKING

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C. Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 5 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case. Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.

Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Who would be without a

MUSIC STAND

Folding and Portable, Square legs, Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/-

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8/6. Carriage Paid.

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

Joseph Riley & Sons,

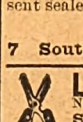
Constitution Hill, Birmingham.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.



LOOK HERE!

To introduce our large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties we will send for Four Stamps one pair SCISSORS and a POCKET KNIFE post free.

VARIETY COMPANY,

(Department 9) DALSTON, LONDON.

£20

Tobacconists Commencing. Send Ild. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 No accounts Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.

LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR

A & 300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A Happy New Year from the Editor and Staff.

GREAT STORIES

No. 522.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending December 31st, 1898.

An Eventful Winter.

"I CAN'T bear foreigners," said Lady Sylvia Somerton crossly. "They are dirty, they are dishonest, they are untruthful."

"My dear child!" her uncle remonstrated. "Surely your assertions are rather sweeping. Have you ever been abroad?"

"No," she confessed, "I have not."

"Then you judge all nations by that French scoundrel I had as a valet—and perhaps a few organ-grinders!"

Lady Sylvia laughed. She had the most delightful gift for seeing the ridiculous side of everything, even when things became personal.

"Well, anyhow," she said, "why go to Pau? A nasty, gossiping place—so I have been told."

"For the simple reason that there I shall get a little hunting."

"Hunting!" she said scornfully—"with bagged foxes! Can't you see the poor things, stiff and sore from being tied up in a sack being turned out for

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

your delectation — if you call that sport then I don't!"

"Sylvia," said Lord Rivers mildly, "do you know that you are in a very bad temper?"

At that Lady Sylvia's clouded face cleared.

"I am cross," she said impulsively, "and a selfish wretch—of course, we'll go to the Antipodes if you like."

"In the meantime," he said good-humouredly, "I only want to go to Pau." And peace was restored.

Lady Sylvia was an orphan, and lived almost entirely with her uncle, who was devoted to his beautiful niece, and usually gave in to her whims, but in this instance he had been given a hint by the doctors that, for a winter or two, Lady Sylvia would be better out of England, but that he was not to frighten her by telling her so—hence the story of the "hunting."

So—to Pau they went, and when Lady Sylvia stood on the "Place Royale" and saw the Pyrenees before her—a glorious panorama of mountains, some of them crowned with snow—in the foreground the sunny "Coteaux" and the shining river, she breathed a deep sigh of appreciation.

"I am glad we came," she said, and then Lord Rivers knew that he had nothing more to fear, and would hear no more reproaches.

"There is a dance to-night at Lady Morley's," he said. "She is an old friend of yours, isn't she? I accepted the invitation on your behalf."

Lady Sylvia nodded—her eyes still fixed on the mountains, but presently her thoughts came back to earth with a run.

"I shall wear my white satin," she said decidedly, "and the turquoise necklace you gave me," and she ran off to hold a solemn conference with her maid.

She was certainly looking her loveliest that night—But the soft blue-black hair, the large, dark, dreamy eyes, the clear olive skin, were more the features of a Southerner than those of an English girl.

The same thought crossed the mind of the young Duque Sebastian Flor d'Espina, as Lady Morley, at his request, introduced him to Lady Sylvia.

The latter made a mental note that this was the best-looking man she had ever met—and how clean for a foreigner!

He began to talk to her—but in broken English, and conversation half of which is "word-hunting" is apt to be a trifle stilted, so they did not get on very well.

"Supposing we talk Spanish," she said suddenly, "it would make things easier for both of us." She said the above sentence in his own tongue, and he was startled to hear how she pronounced her words, like one to the manner born.

She noted his look, and smiled.

"I have a Spanish grandmother," she said, "and have spoken Spanish since I was a child."

"Ah," he said, "then that is why you have a Spanish face—and hold your fan Spanish fashion with your thumb outside."

She laughed.

"Is that Spanish?" she asked. "Then it must be the result of heredity, for I do it quite unconsciously."

After that evening, Lady Sylvia met Sebastian Flor d'Espina everywhere, the acquaintance ripened into friendship—the friendship—well, in any case, Lord Rivers thought it prudent to make a few inquiries about the young man in question, to avoid future complications.

The result of his inquiries was eminently satisfactory. The Duque Flor d'Espina was the head of one of the oldest families in Spain, he was very rich, was an attaché at the Spanish Embassy in Paris, was wild about diplomacy, and would, in all probability, blossom some day into an ambassador.

The situation, Lord Rivers felt, was not one to cavil about. Of the man himself, he knew nothing; but "Sylvia is not the woman to marry either a roué or a fool," he decided, and as he had known her since her childhood he was competent to judge.

One night at a dance, Lady Sylvia noticed that Flor d'Espina was preoccupied, his face wore an anxious, worried look, foreign to him; and she made up her mind to ask him what was the matter.

"Please tell me," she said, "if I can be of any use; but a woman can't do much, only sympathise."

"And that means helping a man over his discouragements and bad times generally, and giving him heart to start afresh," he said, "so I wouldn't say 'only' if I were you; but my trouble, I will tell you, though assuredly in this one you will not be able to help."

"Try me," she said quickly, "there is nearly always a way out of a difficulty, and two pairs of eyes can see better than one."

"Well," he said, lowering his voice, "the case is this. The Carlists have got up a plot against the Queen of Spain. The idea is to surround her villa at B—— take her prisoner, carry her on board the gun-boat which is always there for her protection, but on board of which the officers are Carlists to a man.

"She is to be taken straight to Brazil. Meantime the Carlists have got up a tremendous movement, it has spread all over the Basque provinces, and, within a few hours after their grand 'coup,' an army of some thousands of desperate men will march on Madrid and proclaim Don Carlos King.

"Now, I have been warned of this, and would go to Madrid myself, but, almost simultaneously with this information, I got a peremptory summons from my chief to return to Paris at once.

"I start by the first train to-morrow—I am only here to say 'good-bye'—Now, you can see what a dilemma I amin. I don't know a single soul here whom Icould trust in such a matter, and the coup is fixed for four days hence."

Lady Sylvia thought a moment before she asked—

"If you knew of such a 'soul' what would he be expected to do?"

"Go post haste to Madrid, and warn the authorities there. There is no time to be lost—I dare not wire or even write—I hear half the postal officials are in the plot and, if that is so, I should spoil everything, as it is, if the authorities were fore-warned they might bring the Queen privately to Madrid—await the 'plot's' fulfilment and arrest the ringleaders. Spaniards are like every other nation—they need some one to follow—'heads' gone—confusion reigns supreme, and chaos is not that which ought to reign in Spain."

Again Lady Sylvia was silent—then she laid a hand gently on his arm.

"Listen," she said. "In my childish days, I was at school in an English convent. In the same class with me was one of the Spanish princesses. We made great friends, chiefly, of course, because of my knowledge of Spanish. But the queer thing about it was that there was so strong a likeness between us, that the Nuns used to laugh about it—once or twice, each dressed in our quaint sky-blue 'uniforms' we were taken for each other."

"All that is very interesting, dear lady," Sebastian said a trifle impatiently, "but what on earth has it got to do with the subject?"

Digitized by Google

"Wait a moment—and you will see. The day after to-morrow, at mid-day, a special train has been o dered to take that same Princess to Madrid (I saw her only this afternoon, and she told me so herself.) She is going with a lady-in-waiting and an Equerry—good. She will not go—but I will—my cousin Lilian Maxwell as my lady-in-waiting—my uncle shall be Equerry for this once!"

"Are you joking?"

"Joking! No, certainly not. You must wire to the railway authorities at Bayonne in the name of the Princess that you want the 'Special' to-morrow morning at eight, having changed your plans.

"There is a very early train from here, which would just get us to Bayonne in time. If we could have confided in her, all would be well, but it is quite an open secret that her sympathies are all with Don Carlos, and we must just trust to Providence that nobody will find out the fraud till we get to our destination.

"Give me the address of the man in Madrid to whom you must write a letter, with names and details, and leave the rest to me."

Flor d'Espina stooped and kissed her hand.

"You are an angel!" he said.

* * * * *

Lord Rivers was wakened out of a post-prandial nap to hear his niece's queer story and her newly-fledged plans. She was half afraid he would forbid her to carry out her scheme, but she only proved by that how comparatively little she knew him.

A Conservative of the old school, revolution and rebellion were to him like red rags to a bull—besides, he had once been to the Spanish Court and had a most chivalrous devotion for the Queen, placed as she was in so difficult a position.

So now he was furious, but all he said was a big oath, and then, "I beg your pardon, my dear, but really, sometimes swearing is almost necessary—safety-valve you know—yes, of course, I'll go. You must wake Lilian up, ask her advice and tell her to hold her tongue," —which rather Irish speech amused Lady Sylvia not a little.

Well—strange as it may seem, everything went most smoothly.

The telegram was sent by Flor d'Espina, the party arrived at the Bayonne Station, and "Her Royal Highness," amid bowing officials proceeded in her special train to Spain.

At every station where they stopped, bouquets were presented, and bonbonnières, an exquisite déjeuner was provided when the time came, and lady Sylvia and her companions thoroughly enjoyed the chocolates and the fun—the former, (speaking Spanish like a native, and having been posted up by Flor d'Espina about one or two trifling but in this case important rules of Spanish Royal etiquette) knew how to behave, in fact, Lord Rivers declared afterwards that she seemed quite at home in her rôle.

At last the party arrived at Madrid, and uncle and niece drove straight to the address Sebastian had given them, left his letter and then went to a hotel.

Next morning, the papers contained a most amusing account of how an English Miladi had by mistake gone off in the Princess Dolores' special train, how she had accepted the Royal goods provided for her, and taken the salaams and civilities (intended for Royalty) as her simple due—but not one paper even hinted that the thing had been pre-arranged, but the person who was most puzzled about the affair was the Princess Dolores herself, who declared that she had never sent a telegram to Bayonne—but luckily her statement was made to the authorities too late to warn the Carlists that somebody was stirring against them, and the Queen and the little King were conveyed in safety to Madrid.

Lady Sylvia and her uncle were sent for by Her Majesty, and, after that interview, Lady Sylvia expressed no further surprise at the unbounded loyalty, devotion, and admiration, which Flor d'Espina had always manifested towards his liege lady.

As they were at Madrid at any rate, Lord Rivers said: "They had better look round them a bit"—so, for some days, Lady Sylvia lived amongst Murillos, and dim old churches, bewildering but exquisite mazes of stone.

One day a long letter came for her.

She carried it off to her room, where she stayed a long time, but she was hunted out again by Lord Rivers, who came to tell her to get ready—the Queen had sent for them again.

This time her Majesty offered Lady Sylvia a post at Court as Maid of Honour to herself.

Lord Rivers looked at his niece as they drove away from the palace (they were to give a definite answer to the offer in a few days time).

"Why don't you try it?" he said.

Lady Sylvia laughed, and Lord Rivers was quick to notice a touch of embarrassment in his niece's voice as she answered.

"I won't take the post for the simple reason that when you came just now to fetch me, I was busy writing a letter to accept another situation I have been offered —as Sebastian's wife."

CONSTANCE CRAIGIE HACKETT.

Digitized by Google

Love's Sacrifice.

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

By MARIAN FINDLAY.

Author of "Not in Vain," "Eileen," "A Girl without Sentiment," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

"WOMEN MUST WEEP."

A GIRL and a man were walking together down a pretty country lane in the South of England. It was early spring, but already the violets were peeping shyly forth, the hedgerows becoming rapidly sweet and radiant, and, on every side, was the glad promise of renewed life and beauty.

The girl was walking with bent head, nervously pulling at the ribbons which adorned her dainty waist, heeding not the sunshine or the flowers, for her heart was full of sadness.

The man strolled at her side in silence, his hands were thrust into his pockets, his straw hat pushed to the back of his curly head, while his fair, handsome face wore an unmistakable look of serious annoyance.

His companion was the first to speak.

"You are not angry with me, Duncan, are you?" she questioned, laying her hand half shyly upon his arm.

Duncan Marston gazed moodily before him, not heeding the gentle touch, and seeing not the tearful, beseeching eyes raised to his face.

"I am disappointed in you, Madeline," he said coldly, "bitterly disappointed. I thought you really cared for me, and I find I have been mistaken. I am not angry, my dear, only disappointed."

"Duncan," the girl cried, in tones full of anguish, "how can you be so cruel? You thought I cared for you! Do you not know that I love you more dearly, far, far more dearly than my life, that it is wringing my heart to let you leave me, and to think of facing my life without your love to brighten it? Oh, Heaven, how shall I bear it!"

Her voice broke and the slim hands were tightly clasped upon her breast, as if to still the throbbing, aching heart.

Marston could not but be touched by the bitter anguish in her last words, he put out his arms and drew her to him.

"Madeline," he whispered, "you are making life needlessly hard for us both. From a foolish, romantic sense of 'duty' you are casting love away from you. My child, you will soon find that you have made a poor exchange."

"Someone once said to me that the only thing worth living for was to do one's duty," Madeline remarked dreamily, resting her head contentedly upon her lover's breast, whilst his arms encircled her.

"That is utter nonsense," was his emphatic reply. "The only thing worth living for is love, my darling, it is the most mighty power in the world. Sweet, do you doubt it?" and his lips were laid upon her own in tender, passionate kisses, while he held her yet more closely to his heart.

Her heart echoed his words; no, she did not doubt it, she knew that its magic touch has power to transform a wilderness into a garden, a humble cottage into a palace of contentment and happiness; that it has power to make the homeliest face beautiful, the tired aching heart, glad and joyous, the darkest days bright with hope and gladsomeness. The God whose name it is planted the sweet flower of Love; it blossomed first in the Garden of Eden, it has been watered with a Saviour's tears and has grown and flourished until youth and age, poet and philosopher, sage and historian, acknowledge its almighty sway and unite in proclaiming it to be verily and indeed "The Greatest Thing in the World."

"Duncan," Madeline said presently, lifting her head from its resting-place, and raising her grave, earnest, eyes to his, "do you think I could expect or look for any real happiness if I sacrificed my poor little Vera? I am all she has in the world, and I promised her mother that the child should ever be my first care and thought——"

"Yes, yes, I know," her lover interrupted impatiently, "but that was years ago, you were too young then to realise the charge with which you were burdening yourself, or to think of the new interests which might come into your life, rendering the keeping of such a promise a difficult task."

"Lapse of time does not make a promise less binding, nor justify one in breaking it," Madeline put in softly.

"I am not asking you to break it," Marston returned, a little reproachfully. "Of course I should not dream of separating you from your little niece. I will even promise to care for the child, for your sake, if you will consent to become my wife and accompany me to India. Madeline, my dear one, can you let me go alone?"

Madeline's heart throbbed passionately.

"Duncan," she moaned, "you are breaking my heart. You know I cannot leave Vera, and the climate of India would kill her, Dr. Kingston tells me, even if she survived the voyage."

"Dr. Kingston be—shot!" was the angry response; "he is an old mollycoddle, and you are little better Madeline, where that child is concerned. If you really cared for me you would not continually be putting her first."

Madeline passed by the unjust words in silence; Marston knew they were ungenerous, and was quick to acknowledge his harshness.

Digitized by Google

"Forgive me, my precious one," he whispered remorsefully. "I scarcely know what I am saying, it is so hard to think of losing you."

Madeline smiled bravely up at him, though her grey eyes were misty with tears.

"My poor boy," she said tenderly. "Ah, Duncan, if I could bear your share of the pain as well as my own, how gladly I would free you from it."

"My dear one," and he raised her hand to his lips almost reverently. "That is like a woman's divine unselfishness. What selfish brutes we men are compared with you! Sweetheart, you make me ashamed of myself."

"I don't feel unselfish, dear," she returned sadly. "I feel as if I want to keep you here," clasping her hands round his arm, "always beside me, and never—never let you go."

He smiled down upon her and touched her forehead lightly with his lips.

"That would be an ideal state of things, my pet, but unfortunately it cannot be carried into effect. 'Men must work' the song says, does it not?"

"Yes," she reponded, with sudden bitterness.

"And women must weep,
And the sooner it's over
The sooner to sleep.

"Oh, Duncan, why is life so hard? A few months ago," she went on, not waiting for him to reply, "when your love came into my life, I thought the world such a glorious, beautiful place to be in. Oh, I was happy, blindly, madly happy, never dreaming that life could hold for me aught but good; but duty's cold, stern fingers touched me, and I awoke from my rosy dreams of happiness to find that for me, such things were not to be! With women I think to love means to suffer, and their whole life may be summed up in one word: 'Renunciation.'"

Her cheeks were burning as she spoke, Marston laid his hand upon her shoulder.

"My little girl," he said gently, "it is so unlike you to speak so bitterly, you are always so brave, so patient."

"I have tried to be so, oh, I have tried," she moaned, "but the struggle, the pain is getting almost more than I can bear. Think, Duncan, just think of all the long, lonely years which must pass before I can see your dear face again; try to think, if you can, how the days will go drearily by, how I shall hunger and thirst for the sound of your voice, the touch of your hand—"

"And do you not think that I shall suffer in my lonely, far-off home?" he questioned reproachfully. "You will have Vera to comfort you, but I shall be alone."

"Ah, but it is all so different for a man, there is so much more in his life, there are so many outside interests to take him out of himself, whilst we women have, of necessity, to be stayers at home, and our grief is an ever present reality to us, there is no getting away from it."

Her companion made no reply, he recognised the truth of her words and could not gainsay them.

They walked on for a short time in silence through the fragrant lanes, where the setting sun was casting chastened gleams of mellow gold upon tree and hedgerow, giving to each a tender, softened radiance.

"I must go home now, Duncan," Madeline said at length, her voice sounding dull and weary, "but before I leave you I want to say that when you go away, I want you to feel that you are free. I shall not hold you bound, dear, in any way, and, in token of your freedom, I must give you back your gift."

She unclasped a slender gold chain as she spoke, and laid it, with the pendant—a small gold heart set with a single diamond—in his hand. For an instance only he held it, then, with a violent gesture, dashed the pretty trinket to the ground and set his foot upon it.

"Duncan," Madeline cried in dismay, "what have you done?"

And stooping, she tenderly raised the crushed fragments, pressing them lovingly to her lips.

"How cruel you women can be!" Marston cried, his face crimson with indignant anger.

"Madeline, are you utterly heartless I wonder!"

Madeline glanced at the broken trinket.

"I fear I am—now," she returned, smiling bitterly at her own wan attempt at a joke. "Don't be angry with me, dearest," she pleaded, "I did it for the best. You cannot guess what it would have cost me to give it up. Oh, my dear love, how can I let you go? If, in the years to come, God will give you back to me once again, my whole life shall be one long, long thanksgiving."

The sweet voice trembled, and the delicate face grew very pale.

Marston took her tenderly in his arms.

"God bless you, my heart's darling," he whispered fondly, "God bless and keep you always."

CHAPTER II.

Love's Big Heart.

When Madeline reached the pretty, low white house which she shared with her little niece and their faithful old servant, she found that Vera was already in bed.

"The poor lamb was just wearied out with pain," said Anne, "so I took and popped her into bed. 'I shall not go to sleep Anne,' she says, as I was carrying her up-stairs, 'I can't sleep till I have kissed Love good-night.'"

"Dear child," murmured Madeline. "I will go to her at once."

"Is that you, my own Love?" cried a sweet, childish voice as Madeline entered the bedroom. "Love," was the quaintly pretty name which Vera had bestowed upon the aunt she held so dear.

"Yes, darling," and Madeline laid her hand tenderly upon the hot forehead.

"Has the pain been very bad, my pet?"

"Oh, not so very bad," the child returned bravely. "My stupid back ached a bit, so Anne thought I had better come to bed."

"I am afraid it must have ached more than 'a bit,' my darling, to make these cheeks so flushed and your hands so dry and burning," Madeline said tenderly.

"Never mind now," returned Vera, "I shall soon be better now you are come," and the little arms were put up to encircle Madeline's neck.

"Did you have a nice walk?" the child asked presently.

"Very nice, darling," Madeline smiled bitterly to herself as she uttered the words.

"Your favourite violets are beginning to show their pretty heads," she continued, "I must carry you into the lane to peep at them to-morrow, if you are well enough."

"Oh, I should like that," was the eager reply, "but I'm afraid I shall be too heavy for you."

"No fear of that, my pet, you are such a mite of a thing, though you are nearly eight years old. And now shut those bright eyes, which are themselves just like two big violets, and I will try to sing the pain away."

Softly Madeline crooned an evening hymn to the tired little sufferer, her low, sweet voice seemed to have an almost magical effect, the restless limbs grew more quiet, and the tired lines on the spirituelle little face relaxed.

Digitized by Google

"How nice that is," the child murmured at length, with a little sigh of utter content.

"Not asleep yet, my birdie?" Madeline questioned.

"No, but I don't mind that; I think I am too happy to sleep. Dear Love," and again the fragile arms were put forth to draw Madeline's face down to her own. "Dear, dear Love, how good you are to me!"

"My own little girl, you are all I have to be good to and care for—Oh, Vera, my treasure, love me all you can, you are all I have in the world," and with a gesture of utter abandon, Madeline sank on her knees beside the bed and buried her face in her hands.

For a few moments nothing could be heard in the little white-curtained room but the child's quick, anxious breathing, and Madeline's stifled sobs.

With gentle touch Vera tenderly stroked the bent head. "My own, own Love," she whispered again and again. "You needn't tell me to care for you; why I couldn't live without you!"

It was sweet to Madeline to feel the child's soft, clinging arms round her, and the loving whispered words were as refreshing to her aching heart as summer rain to drooping flowers.

A week later and Duncan Marston was gone. The last good-byes were said, the last tender words spoken, and then Madeline saw him leave her. How and when would they meet again, she vaguely wondered, with a dull, sick feeling at her heart. He had spoken hopefully of his return, and of their happy life together in the years to come, but Madeline's heart was too sore to think of the future, and meanwhile life had to be faced, and all the daily round of duties taken up again. The days passed wearily by, and Madeline's cheeks lost some of their soft bloom, and her sweet eyes had a wistful, far-off look which did not escape Vera's notice.

One day she was sitting beside the little invalid's couch, reading a fairy story.

"'And the handsome Prince married the lovely Princess, and he took her away to his beautiful castle, where they both lived happily ever afterwards,'" she concluded.

"There, Vera, pet, isn't it a nice ending?"

"Very nice, but they all end like that, Love, don't they?" the child returned. "Is it true, are people always happy?"

"Fairy stories are not true, my darling," Madeline replied, "and people are not always happy I am afraid. But we are happy, Vera, you and I, so we will try not to worry about imaginary unhappiness."

Vera's deep blue eyes were raised earnestly to her aunt's face, and she pushed aside the tossed golden hair from her hot cheeks.

"Are you happy?" she questioned uneasily. "Sometimes I fancy that something troubles you, dear, and you do not tell me."

"Vera, my own, you are growing fanciful," Madeline returned brightly, stooping to kiss the sweet, upturned face. "Of course I am happy."

"And there is nothing troubling you, dear Love?" the child went on with tender persistency.

Madeline could not utter what was not true with those loving eyes searching her face. She made a hasty resolve, and, kneeling beside the low couch, took the little fragile form into her arms.

"Listen, my darling," she said slowly, "I will tell you what has troubled me. I have lost something, Vera, something I prized more than all else beside, book or trinket, it matters not what it was, it is gone and can never be my own again, and I have grieved over it my darling, foolishly, childishly. My Vera would be wiser than that, would she not?"

"I don't know," the child returned thoughtfully. "I am not very wise, but I don't think it would hurt me very much to lose anything I have, so long as I kept my own dear Love."

The ready tears sprang to Madeline's eyes. Ah, was not that just what she felt? How bravely she could have faced any trouble if she could but have kept her "own dear love" at her side!

Meanwhile there came many loving letters from Marston, telling of his lonely home, and how he longed for Madeline's presence to cheer and brighten it. Thus three years slipped away, and then there came an urgent appeal to Madeline to come out to him.

"I am doing well out here, my dear one," he wrote, "but the loneliness is very great, and I need you more than any words can say. If you care for me, darling, you will put my wishes first, and if you cannot make up your mind to leave Vera at school in England, why then, you must bring her with you, and let her make her home with us."

Very tenderly and eloquently Marston pleaded his cause, and, as Madeline read the letter, her tears fell thick and fast.

To leave fragile, delicate little Vera at school was quite out of the question, while to take her abroad was a risk which Dr. Kingston would not sanction, and poor Madeline grew sick at heart as she realised that her lover's visions of far-off happiness must end, as such dreams often do. That life's stern awakening had come to her, and must be faced, alone.

A pitiful little letter it was which she sent to her lover, a sweet, womanly effort to soften his pain and conceal her own anguish, which Marston, in the bitterness of his disappointment, chose to blindly misinterpret.

He could not guess with what heart-broken sobs those brave, tender words had been penned, and knew nothing of the weary loneliness and heartsick longing which she had so generously striven to hide, that his pain might be lessened.

In hot anger he wrote again; bitter, cruel words, which seemed to burn themselves into Madeline's brain when she read them.

"Dear God," she moaned, "how shall I bear it! He thinks I do not care and that I have grown cold and heartless; well, perhaps it is better so, 'twill be the easier for him to forget me, but oh, my dear, dear love, how am I going to live through the long, lonely years without you?"

CHAPTER III.

Ten Years Later.

It was Springtime once more, glad, joyous Springtime. The hedgerows were gay with blossoms, the balmy air was filled with a thousand fragrant perfumes, the birds were carolling their happiest strains, and all Nature seemed with one accord to rejoice that the winter was over and the sweet resurrection of the year at hand.

The windows of the pretty morning room at Ivy Cottage were thrown wide open, and gave a welcome admittance to the many sweet sounds and perfumes.

Great bowls of purple lilac stood upon the dark oaken

Digitized by Google

table, and trailing boughs of white and pink hawthorn were placed in tall jars in distant corners of the room, making the air heavy with their fragrance.

A bright, girlish face, framed in a wealth of wavy, golden hair, looked in at the window and greeted the occupant of the room with a loving smile.

"It is such a perfect day!" she exclaimed, "do put your work away and come into the garden, Love."

Vera still clung to the old fond name, and Madeline was glad to have it so. She looked up from her sewing, smiling at the tender, coaxing tones which she found so hard to resist.

"The wallflowers seem to be crying out for you to come and admire them, and everything is so sweet and lovely that it is a shame to stay indoors. Oh, Love, isn't it a glorious, beautiful world?" the girl added, with a glad, joyous ring in her voice.

"Very beautiful, my Vera," was the low reply; there was a tinge of sadness in the soft voice which Madeline could not entirely repress.

How fair and sweet the old-world garden had seemed to her but a few years ago, when, with lightest, gladdest heart, she had been wont to meet her lover, listen to his burning words of love and feel his strong, tender arms around her. Ah, surely she had Heaven in her heart in those dear, halcyon days!

But now, alas, only the memory of former happiness remained to be dwelt on, in her solitary moments, with yearning heart-hunger.

Stifling a sigh, she rose to join Vera in the garden, and together they wandered about the paths, pausing beside the old sun-dial while Vera laughingly traced the quaint figures with a little sunburnt forefinger.

They made a winsome picture as they stood together, Madeline, in her soft, grey gown, with its dainty ruffles of snowy lace, serving as an admirable foil to the fresh girlish form at her side, clad in palest, shell-like pink, the golden hair bound by a ribbon of the same delicate hue, the big garden hat slung over her arm, and in lieu of being used for its legitimate purpose converted into an impromptu flower basket and filled to over-flowing with fragrant clusters of lilac.

"Is it not exquisite?" she cried, turning to Madeline and burying her face in the mass of blossom.

"Where are you going to put it all, Vera?" Madeline questioned, smilingly. "Every available vase is filled already, and each room is a veritable flower-garden."

"Oh, I'll find a corner for it somewhere, never fear, I cannot help gathering it, it is just irresistible."

The sound of footsteps upon the gravelled path made them both turn to see a broad, manly figure coming towards them. There was something familiar to Madeline in the tall, erect form and handsome, smiling face. A sudden rush of crimson flooded her face from brow to chin, and she stepped quickly forward.

"Duncan!" she cried almost breathlessly, "Duncan, is it possible?"

For answer he took her hands in his and held them closely. "Yes, Madeline, it is I," he whispered. "I see I am not forgotten."

For a moment Madeline did not speak, her heart was too full. Then she turned to the girl at her side.

"Vera, my darling," she said speaking hurriedly, and in tones strangely unlike her usually low, calm utterance, "this is my old friend, Mr. Marston; you will scarcely remember him, I think, you were so young when he went away."

Vera held out her hand with a frank, unaffected smile. "Oh, yes," she said, "I remember Mr. Marston quite well, and I am glad to welcome back an old friend."

"That is a very kind remark, Miss Vera," Marston said as he took her hand and gazed smilingly down into her eyes, "I am happy to think you will count me amongst your friends."

"Love's friends are always mine also," the girl returned simply; then turned to her aunt, saying she would take the flowers indoors as the hot sun was withering them, and Madeline was left alone with her lover.

For a few moments neither spoke. Madeline felt dazed and confused; the golden sunlight half-blinded her, and the strange, sudden joy in her heart was almost pain.

Marston took her hand and drew it through his arm, looking at her with the old, fond glance she remembered and loved so well.

"The years have been long without you, Madeline," he said tenderly, "but they have made little change in you. It is just the same sweet little woman I left behind, more than a dozen years ago."

Madeline laughed, softly, happily, the sudden, sweet gladness seemed to transform her; the lines which had begun to show round the tender mouth had disappeared, as if by magic. There was a glad ring in her voice, and a young, joyous light in her eyes as she met her lover's gaze, with simple, unaffected happiness.

"You are changed, Duncan," she said half shyly, "you are handsomer than ever, but I should have known you amongst a thousand others."

Marston laughed a pleased, gratified laugh, and pressed her hand more closely to his side.

"The change is only in my outward appearance, my darling, I assure you," he whispered fondly, "but what miracle has been wrought in your little Vera? The delicate child I remember seems to have quite disappeared."

"Yes," Madeline returned gladly, "Vera has now quite outgrown her early weakness and is fairly strong, and is she not lovely, Duncan?"

"Is she?" Marston responded absently, "I didn't notice. I had eyes for one face only, my dearest, the sweetest face on earth to me." And Madeline's heart thrilled with happiness as she listened to the tender words.

All the long, weary years of separation were forgotten now, the sweet, glad present blotted out all remembrance of the past. And is it not ever thus? We are so like the children who cry for their broken plaything, until becoming enamoured of some new toy, the trouble is all forgotten, and the smiles return even before the tears are dried.

We all crave for happiness in this life, it is a natural desire, and surely no wrong one, and, if it come to us we are always ready to forget the pain with which it was preceded, while we drink to the full of the cup of joy.

So the days came and went as an happy dream to Madeline, and life had a deeper, fuller meaning than ever before.

She longed that all the world might share her gladness, and the great love of her life, almost divine in its rare unselfishness, filled her only with purer, higher thoughts and fairer aspirations.

Marston accepted her devotion very naturally and with much complaisance. It pleased him and gratified his vanity to note how the sweet, bright colour would flood her face at his coming, and the swift, glad light illumine her eyes when they met his own.

Digitized by Google

Three months flew by ere the first glamour of Madeline's happiness was shadowed, but at length a cloud arose, a cloud at first no bigger than a man's hand, but which hid the sunlight from her and filled her with a terrible, nameless dread.

It was a glorious day in August, the sky was a deep, cloudless blue, and the sun blazed o'erhead in fierce splendour.

Madeline and Marston were seated in the shadow of the verandah, which formed a welcome shelter from the hot sun.

They were very silent as they sat there. Madeline's work had fallen unheeded to the ground and her hands lay idly clasped in her lap. Marston was leaning back in a low garden chair, lazily watching the faint, blue clouds of smoke slowly issuing from his lips as he silently puffed away at his pipe. Presently they heard a quick, light step, and a soft voice singing:

"There's nothing half so sweet in life
As Love's young dream," made them both look up.

"You two look half asleep," Vera cried merrily, bringing her song to an abrupt end. "I feel it is my duty to arouse you and find you some employment, you both look so incorrigibly lazy."

"It is so hot," Madeline murmured, half apologetically, while Marston rose and pulled a chair forward for Vera.

"Love, here are some letters which have just come for you, are you equal to the exertion of reading them?" Vera questioned saucily, tossing a bulky packet into Madeline's lap. "And you Mr. Marston," she continued, "may hold this wool for me; it will be nice for you to feel that you are doing something really useful."

Marston smiled as he obediently took the skein from her hand, in doing so his fingers touched hers, and she blushed a vivid, rosy red at the contact.

"Why are you winding all this wool, Miss Vera?" Marston questioned presently, as he watched the small hands flying to and fro. "Isn't it much too hot to think of wearing such wraps as this stuff makes?"

"Yes," asserted Vera, "but it will not always be summer remember, we have to look ahead sometimes and think for the future."

"Ah," Marston replied dreamily, "if we could always look ahead, how differently our lives would turn out; if it were possible to look into the future how many of our early errors might be prevented!"

His deep tones were full of significance, but softly though they were uttered, the words did not escape Madeline's quick ears.

She did not speak, but her heart seemed to die within her as she listened.

She watched the shy colour come and go in Vera's cheeks, and she saw the tender light in Marston's eyes, which, long ago, she alone had power to call forth, and suddenly it seemed to her that life had lost all its sweetness and light; she shivered slightly and rose somewhat unsteadily to her feet.

Vera turned swiftly.

"What is it?" she asked anxiously. "Are you not well?"

"I am a little tired, Vera, that is all, the heat has made my head ache, I shall be better if I rest a little."

"Let me come with you," the girl cried, half rising, but Madeline laid a detaining hand upon her arm.

"No, my child," she said gently, "I shall be better alone."

Once safely in her own room she shut and locked the door and sank upon her knees beside the bed; no tears came to her relief, but a low, stricken moan, "Oh, Heaven," broke from her white lips.

How long she knelt there she never knew; she sank into a dreamy state, half sleep, half stupor, from which she was at length roused by the sound of low voices, talking eagerly. She heard, as in a dream, the deep, manly voice she loved so well, telling the old, old story, she heard the soft murmur of Vera's shy replies; then, from the low movement beneath her window, and the rustle of the ivy which climbed round the house, she knew they had risen, and that Marston's arms were round the girl at his side.

Then she heard her own name timidly uttered by Vera, followed by a quick denial from Marston.

"Madeline and I are the best of friends, but nothing more," she heard him say. "We had a childish fancy for each other, years ago, but that is long since past and gone. My little one; you are my very life and soul.'

Oh, the supreme agony of that moment to Madeline' In it the bitterness of death seemed to engulf her, blotting out for ever, all the joy of living; then there came a sudden wild pain at her heart, and a blackness before her eyes. It passed away almost instantly, and she rose mechanically, smoothed her hair and arranged her dress with that strange precision which often takes possession of us in some great crisis of our lives.

She forced herself to go downstairs, to smilingly reply to Vera's loving inquiries, and to meet Marston's gaze with unruffled composure.

A few hours later, when they were alone for a short time, Madeline seized the opportunity for which she had been waiting of speaking to Marston.

"Duncan," she said quietly, without a tremour in her soft voice, "I have been thinking that we have made a mistake, you and I. I do not think that, as your wife, I should make you happy, and it is better, is it not, to face these things now, before it is too late to remedy them?"

Marston glanced keenly at her, wondering if it were possible she could know anything of what had taken place that afternoon.

"Am I to understand, then, that you are tired of me, Madeline?" he queried, a little stiffly.

"Not quite that, dear," Madeline returned, smiling bravely into his face, "we must always be good friends, but I think a closer tie might, in time, become irksome, and it would scarcely be wise to risk that, would it?"

Marston took her hand. "I thought you cared for me, Madeline," he said reproachfully.

"I do care for you, Duncan," was the low reply, "you will always be as a dear, dear brother to me."

"But, my dear Madeline—" he was beginning eagerly, when Vera's entrance made him pause. Madeline rose as the girl came into the room.

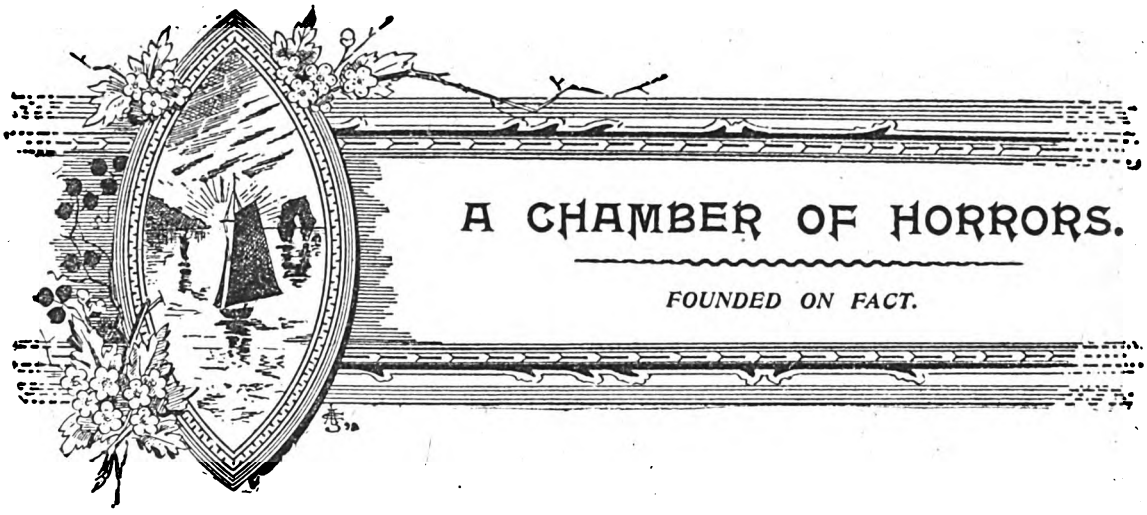
"I think I must leave you two to amuse each other," she said a little wearily. "My head is still so painful that I fear I am poor company to-night."

Vera put her loving young arms round her aunt's slight form, noticing as she did so, how white and worn the sweet faced looked.

"Dear Love, is the pain very bad?" she questioned tenderly.

"It will be gone to-morrow, my darling," Madeline returned, kissing the upturned face, "the heat has tried me very much to-day. Good-night, my dear one. God bless you," and then, with a gentle "good-night" to Marston she left the room.

Digitized by Google



A CHAMBER OF HORRORS.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

THERE is a certain house in a certain town known to certain members of the theatrical profession as the "Haunted House."

For many years in the exercise of my calling—the histrionic—I had paid annual visits to this town, but for superstitious reasons had carefully avoided the domicile in question, and sought "diggings" elsewhere. Fortune, it is said, favours but the brave. Hence, on a tempestuous night in an unusually bleak October, I found myself wandering the streets of this afore-mentioned town, roomless, wet and hungry.

My old lodgings had been acquired by other members of our company, and every available set of "comfortable apartments" were "Quite full, sir!"

House after house had I inquired at, till I had made a call at every known address where "theatricals" were taken in and done for. I say "every," but in this I err.

One remained which I knew well, but for that very reason passed uncalled-at. At length, wearied by my unsuccessful search, I paused before it. The familiar shaped card stared me in the face, the legend, "Furnished Apartments," hung invitingly from its lighted windows.

I gazed, I hesitated.

My fears urged me to continue my explorations; my keen sense of physical discomfort pleaded with me to go no further.

"He who hesitates is lost," was again verified in my case, for calling up the sailor's philosophy of "any port in a storm," I ascended the steps and rang the bell.

An elderly woman of somewhat unwashed condition and forbidding physiognomy, after a lapse of some moments, emerged from the lower regions of the domicile, and partially opened the door.

After favouring me with an apparently suspicious inspection of my personal apparel, she asked me what I wanted.

"A bed and sitting room till next Sunday!" was my answer.

"Are you with next week's company?" she inquired, eyeing me once more, as I supposed, with the idea of arriving at the maximum rental it would be advisable to ask for her rooms. Receiving a reply in the affirmative, she motioned me into a large room on the right of the passage.

"I didn't intend to let this week," she said, with another hesitating look. "I'm not very well, but as you're alone, you won't give much trouble. You'd like something to eat, I suppose?"

"I should," I admitted, "but about terms?"

To my surprise, however, the price asked was rather below the average, so we quickly completed our negotiations, and in a few moments I was seated before a substantial meal. My supper was soon disposed of, so, feeling tired after my peregrinations I rang the bell, and on the old woman's re-entering, remarked that if she would show me my room I would retire at once.

For a moment she stared at me without speaking, the same hesitating, uneasy expression on her face I had noted on entering.

At length, finding her tongue, she said the bedroom was not quite ready, and suggested that she should make the fire up, and I amuse myself with a book for half an hour or so, by which time the room would be prepared. Her explanation appeared plausible, so I gave my assent, and was settling myself in the depths of an armchair, when I caught sight of her face. The expression of relief upon it appeared far greater than the occasion warranted.

Back with redoubled force came the superstitious dread with which the house's reputation had filled me, but which for the time being the warmth and light of the sitting-room had dissipated.

What did the woman's confusion point to?

Only that I was to occupy the haunted chamber! For one room alone was said to enjoy practically the monopoly of ghostly visitors. I determined to question her. "Is there anything else wrong with the room?" I asked tremblingly.

"What should there be?" was the reply—spoken almost fiercely—but with a whitening of her cheek, scarcely, I thought, consistent with her tone.

"Why—you see—is—isn't it supposed to be haunted?" I stammered, half ashamed of my fears.

"Haunted? Well, I've heard people as have seen ghosts or what they thought was such, but it's afore my time. Since I've had the house there's been no complaints, and"—with a meaning look at the jug on the table—"I hope you won't take too much of that during the week, then I reckon you won't make any either. I trust not, anyways, because I've a hard job to let as it is. Don't look for ghosts is my advice, sir, and depend upon it, you won't see anything worse than yourself."

Digitized by Google

"But haven't you another room at liberty?"

"No, sir, I haven't," and as if to preclude further questioning, she hastily left the room, leaving me to my reflections. And they were by no means pleasant ones, consisting as they did of the personal reminiscences of sundry of my professional brethren who had—if their statements were to be believed—spent nights of horror in the chamber which awaited me. I remembered, and the fact did not tend to dissipate my fears, that my confrères' stories, although varying slightly in detail, in the main incident corresponded. One and all had witnessed the re enactment of the tragedy to which the house owed its evil reputation. They had seen the nebulous form of a woman, stealing cautiously towards the shadowy figure of a man, who stood with his back turned, gazing from the uncurtained window. The woman had placed her arm caressingly round the man's neck, and as his face turned expectantly towards her, with one swift stroke of a glittering razor blade she had cut his throat from ear to ear. The body staggered, but in the act of falling, was caught in the extended arms of the woman, who had dragged it across the floor, and thrusting it into the depths of a huge cupboard, she had melted into the darkness and disappeared.

Was I, too, to be a witness of this ghostly tragedy? I trembled at the thought, but at this moment the landlady entered once more, bearing my candle, and with the information that she would show me to my room. Ashamed to confess my superstitious dread, I signified my willingness to follow, and like a lamb to the slaughter I was conducted to the upper regions. She led the way up an exceedingly broad staircase to a landing from which two or three passages branched. Taking one which turned off sharply to the left, the woman preceded me along a corridor, between two dead walls, to what was apparently a wing of the building entirely isolated from the rest. At the end of the corridor was a single door, which she threw open, and, signifying that my room was within, she left me.

As soon as I was alone I took a hasty survey of my surroundings, and was agreeably surprised to find nothing to add to my fears.

There was no ancient four-poster with catafalque-like hangings—no oriel windows through which the weird light of the moon cast uncanny shadows on the floor—no mouldering tapestry hanging from the walls, with dead and gone warriors worked thereon, and swaying to and fro under the influence of a moaning autumnal wind. No, none of that! The wind was there, certainly, coming in gusts through the joists of an ill-fitting window, but the tapestry wasn't, while in its place was a bilious-looking wall-paper of distinctly modern design. The furniture, too, was in keeping with the paper. Just a small, iron bedstead, with semi-detached brass ornaments—a twelve and sixpenny marble-topped wash-hand stand, whose only claim to antiquity lay in its plentifully besplattered dirt-stains—a chest of drawers, of about equal value, and deficient of a leg, which was efficiently represented by an ancient volume of the church service. These, and a chintz-covered packing-case, surmounted by a cracked mirror, comprised the lot—and a job lot they were! Stay! There was one piece of furniture I had forgotten—a large old-fashioned wardrobe, built into a recess. I had reason to remember this later. At the moment, I thought it a suitable place to hang my overcoat. I tried the door, but finding it locked I crammed the coat within the somewhat limited space of a drawer.

My nervousness had by this time almost entirely left me—due, I presumed, to the most material aspect of the room. Probably, but for my collar stud, it would never have returned, but that stud was my undoing. In extricating it from my shirt band, it slipped from my fingers, and fell to the floor. At one period in my career I should have jumped within the sheets and left it unsought until the morning. Experience had, however, taught me, that a collar-stud not found on the moment of its loss, was a collar-stud lost to its possessor for all time, a thing only to be unearthed from its hiding-place by some future occupant of the chamber who has another, and consequently no immediate, necessity for a second.

In my search I had occasion to remove the rug which lay beside my bed and close to the window. In a moment stud and everything were forgotten in the horror that met my eyes. There upon the uncovered boards was a dark red stain, the nature of which there was no mistaking. It was blood! Blood fresh and bright in colour, as if it had been shed but a few hours. It had sunk into the boards—it had filled the crevices—it had run in little rivulets hither and thither—there must have been pints of it. A sheep might have been slaughtered there, and caused no larger stain—or—Great Heaven—a man! A man who had stood with his back turned, gazing from the uncurtained window!

It was true, then, and this at my feet was the proof of the dark deed—the blood of the murdered, which neither time nor art could efface.

I stood spellbound, gazing upon the fatal spot—stood while one might have counted a hundred, and then turned to fly, preferring to face the rain and wind of the October night, rather than remain in that human slaughter-house.

There was one fact I had completely overlooked: I was quite undressed, so, notwithstanding my fears, I attempted to huddle on my clothing, but my trembling fingers refused their office. Then my terrors got the better of me, and giving it up in despair, I sprang into bed, and buried my head under the clothes.

How long I lay awake, trembling, I know not. It seemed hours. Finally, I must have fallen asleep, for when I awoke, the candle, which I perfectly remembered leaving alight, had burnt itself out, and save for the light of a particularly sickly-looking moon, the room was in darkness.

I had omitted to draw the blind, consequently that portion of the room adjacent to the window was lit up by the moon-rays, the remainder was in deeper shadow. What caused me to awake I cannot say, probably the weight of clothes upon my head. The first sound which greeted my awakening senses was that of a neighbouring clock striking the hour of midnight—the hour, upon the authority of Hamlet, "When churchyards yawn and graves give up their dead." At the same time, my eyes fell upon the dark spot on the floor, upon which the moon was shining. As I gazed, the mental picture I had drawn of the dead and gone crime took shape—the hideous phantasmagoria of the dark deed unrolled itself before me.

I saw the dim outline of a man emerge from the shadows beyond, and stand motionless, gazing from the uncurtained window. I saw another shadow-like form, in the shape of a woman, steal towards him with arms extended, as if about to confer a caress. The arm slowly encircled the man's neck, his face turned reciprocatingly towards her. Something glittered for a moment in the moon-rays, and then sank into the white throat, and with one swift stroke hacked its way through flesh and sinew. I saw the head fall back helplessly and blood appear, spurting out in jets, and streaming to the floor, into which it sank, dying the boards with its crimson stain. I saw the man's arms fly up, as if in mute appeal to Heaven—saw him stagger and fall forward, into the arms of the woman, who bore him slowly backward, till she reached the huge wardrobe. I saw her with difficulty thrust him into it, and double-lock the doors upon him, then, with one cautious glance round, fade slowly away into the darkness.

Digitized by Google

The dark stain upon the floor alone remained. I felt instinctively that what I had witnessed was but a vision of my mind's eye, yet everything was so real that I knew sleep was impossible till I had satisfied myself of its unreality. The cupboard alone could satisfy that, so I resolved to explore its recesses. I dragged my shaking limbs from the bed, reeled towards it, and shook it violently.

It was of course locked as before. No matter. It must open! I pulled and wrenched, till the screws tore themselves free from the frail and rotten woodwork, and the doors flew suddenly apart.

As they came open, something that had been huddled up within fell outward, full upon me; it bore me to the ground with its crushing weight.

It rolled over me, conveying a coldness as of the grave by its icy touch. I sprang to my feet in an ecstasy of terror, and thrust it from me. It fell within the band of light cast by the moon, and then I saw what it was. Oh Heaven, the horror of it! It was the body of a dead man, with his throat cut from ear to ear!

With a wild cry for help I rushed to the door. The long corridor was before me, dark and silent. It mattered not! Human society lay beyond! I turned to fly, but as I did so my foot caught in a mat, and I fell prostrate. For a time all was oblivion.

When I came to myself a doctor was bending over me. Beside him stood the landlady listening shamefacedly to his angry reproaches—reproaches in which, when I heard the medical man's explanation, I felt well inclined to join.

It appeared that on the morning of the day of my arrival, her son, a worthless reprobate, had, in a fit of delirium, committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. He had occupied the room in which I was placed, and at the moment of my arrival his body was lying in the bed in which I was to have slept.

The woman had not intended to let, but her cupidity being aroused at the unexpected opportunity, and my being alone, she had thrust the body within the cupboard, intending to remove it on the morrow, when she knew I should be at the theatre unpacking.

The re-enactment of the tragedy was, of course, the result of imagination, doubtless conjured up by my discovery of the blood upon the floor.

However, I had had enough of the "Haunted House," so, as soon as I could decently intrude, I went to the rooms of another member of our company, and begged him to allow me to share them with him. He consented readily enough, though, had he refused, and nothing offered but the pavement for a bed, and the dark vault of Heaven for a roof, I would have chosen them, rather than have spent another night in what had been to me a veritable "Chamber of Horrors!"

HUBERT BARTLETT.

£100 OFFERED THIS WEEK. £100

This week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses 100 envelopes to 100 people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD

and address it to the Editor under the following conditions: Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

One hundred names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 13 distribution must reach us by January 3rd, addressed to The 13th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of Distribution No. 10.

THREE of the fifty people for whom sovereigns have been set aside have applied for them this week. They are:

M. J. Adams, 94 Alcombe Road, Northampton.
Miss Mulliner, 71 Granleigh Road, Leytonstone.
W. H. Proctor, School Board Offices, Congleton, Cheshire.

The unclaimed money was addressed to:

C. Hurdlo, 68 Church Road, Upper Norwood, S.E.; A. Jenkins, 45 Vue Road, Brighton; Thos. Simon, 13 Hauteville, Guernsey; W. G. Harris, Upper Street, Shere, near Guildford; F. H. Parker, "Wensley," Manor Road, Wallington, Surrey; J. Shain, Longfellow House, 29a Palmerston Road, Bowes Park, N.; Miss Warwick, 16 Cornfield Terrace, Eastbourne; H. J. Taylor, Collegiate School, Glastonbury, Somerset; G. F. Matthews, 20 West Street, Chichester; F. Glancy, Eaton's Lane, Boyle, Ireland; F. Martin, 4 Edith Villas, Newmarket; T. Youngs, Stowupland Street, Stowmarket, Suffolk; Mrs. Ker, 23 Falkland Road, Egremont, Liverpool; Alf. Jester, 22 Eridge Road, Tunbridge Wells; J. Wilson, Carr House, Seaton Carew, Durham; R. Robson, 35 Croydon Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne; J. F. Boyle, 53 Queen Street, Clonmel; J. Osborne, Main Street, Brampton, Cumberland; Mrs. Clowes, Holly Hill, Bowness-on-Windermere; Geo. Patterson, 24 Suffolk Street, Helensburgh, N.B.; J. Kish, 24 Galloway Street, Maxwelltown, Dumfries; Alex. Macrae, 8 Francis Street, Stornoway, The Outer Hebrides; Mrs. Powell, Panycoed, St. Clears, South Wales; P. R. Day, 18 Bloomsbury Square, W.C.; Thos. Olley, 8 Bristol Mews, Paddington, W.; Mark Beck, Bull's Head Lane, Stoke, Warwickshire; H. Ackland, Postmaster, Lundy Island; Jas. Lemin, 9 Fore Street, Redruth; Mrs. Adams, 2 West End Avenue, Harrogate; J. Quayle, 10 Wade Street, Leeds; T. Briggs, Hollows House, Little Town, Liversedge; Thos. Richardson, Sawtry, Peterborough; W. Jackson, Langham, Oakham; Thos. Day, 16 Church Road, Willesden, N.W.; Alf Young, 47 Alkham Road, Stoke Newington, N; John Andrews, 6 Park Hill Road, Bromley; H. Allberry, 49 Mount Ararat Road, Richmond, Surrey; Mrs. Wilson, 94 Wellesley Road, Gunnersbury; A. Campbell, King Street, Hammersmith; Miss Noakes, 15 Hastings Road, Maidstone, Kent; A. Allen, 41 Commercial Street, Hereford; T. Altham, 3 Princess Street, Nelson; F. Brown, 19 Castle Street, Reading, Berks; F. C. Burnham, Maidenhead, Berks; Mrs. Mundy, 163 Walton Street, St. Thomas's, Oxford; J. Knight, Harrold, Bedford; H. Brooks, 5 Manchester Road, Hyde, Cheshire.

Digitized by Google

By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.
Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," etc., etc.

BOOK I.—CONCERNING THE FLIGHT FROM CULLODEN MOOR.

SUMMARY.

A MAJOR and a cornet of Sheridan's Horse seek refuge in the wilds of Lochaber after the battle of Culloden Moor. They are joined by another refugee, Murtagh O'Neill. The major succumbs to wounds received in the engagement, and a troop of heavy cavalry discover the hiding place of the remaining two fugitives, and give chase to them.

CHAPTER III.

How the five dragoons were outwitted; how Murtagh O'Neill provided doe-venison; how the two reconnoitred; how the flood-tide flows in S. Peter's Strait; and how a trading cutter was requisitioned without the usual formalities.

ALL throughout the chase snow or sleet had been coming down apace, but when O'Neill looked round, he saw that a snowstorm was driving up with the wind such as would put all previous efforts to scorn. He told Sneyd of this, and added, "Run two more minutes, yer honour, for all you're worth, and then I promise yez a halt." At the same time he slightly increased his own pace, and Sneyd, helped by the lead—as one always is, when running—puffed and panted in his wake, spurting most pluckily.

The clouds of downy flakes came down with racing speed, and enveloped all in their folds. O'Neill looked back. "Another half-minute," he said, "an' they'll have lost the sight of us." Then, directly afterwards, turning sharply to his right, he motioned Sneyd to stop, and pulled him down under the cover of a clump of juniper bushes. "They'll hide your honour nicely," he said. "Lie low, an' let the sodjers pass yez. I'll stay here. When they've gone by, an' we've got our winds again, we'll be up an' off across the strame. There's wood over yonder, an' once in it, they might as well search for diamonds in the Bog of Allen as try to find us there."

Sneyd crouched as he was directed, and presently heard the dragoons' heavy boots going past—crush, crish, crush, through the slushy peat soil. One, two, three, he counted; then four; and then, after a pause, five. These went stolidly on into the blinding storm, and were lost to hearing in the distance. There had been six in the first batch, so another should come up. But as minute after minute passed and he did not put in an appearance, the cornet concluded that the man had turned back.

O'Neill had evidently arrived at the same conclusion, for just then he started to his feet, and beckoning his companion, started off at a steady jog-trot, directly down-hill. Sneyd followed, and presently they came to the Ree, swollen by the morning's rains, but still not up to mid-thigh. The water was bitterly cold, but they were soon across it, and were pressing through the thick bushy undergrowth on the opposite bank.

Presently the trees around them became taller, and in a short while they entered a regular forest.

There was little chance of the dragoons following them here. In summer, what with hazels and other bushes, the place would have been well-nigh impassable; and, even now, the tree-trunks and bare branches were often set so thickly as to bar a straight passage. Rocks, too, jutting out from the surface, frequently necessitated a considerable detour. So that there was small probability that anyone but an experienced woodsman could follow their trail, even if he had been fortunate enough to pick it up. But, for all that, they did not come to a halt. The neighbourhood was too dangerous to stay in. When the storm had passed, and the soldiers did not see them elsewhere, they would most assuredly scour the wood. So the pair of them kept on at a good sharp walk, holding, as nearly as they could, a line parallel to the coast.

Steering amongst trees, when the sky is overcast, and a snowstorm is raging, would not be an easy task, but for one thing. If the wind remains fairly constant, one can set a fair course by it, failing a better guide. O'Neill, who had been a sailor, knew this, "And," said he, "we'll just hold on, yer honour, for six good Irish miles av the cover lasts, an' then we may sit ourselves down an' feel that we're in safety."

Digitized by Google

"And if we find ourselves out of the wood?" suggested Sneyd.

"Why, then, we'll hark back a hundred yards or so, an' dig a burrow of some sort there. Any way, there's nothing like a plantin' o' this kind for a bhoy to hide in when he's wanted. It's me own father that stowed away for two years in a ten-acre patch on the back of the Kesh mountain, wid twenty goulden guineas on his head. 'Twas a powerful sum of money, yer honour, wasn't it? I mind me the ould man used to sigh an' say he'd give information on himself blythely, av they could only promise to let him have the spendin' of the money when he came to be a ghost. But he couldn't figure out how that was to be done nohow, an' so at last he gives it up in despair, and just turns tail and runs away, and settles down peaceably in Galway. Howly saints! it's another climb we have before us. Awful mountainous this, yer honour, isn't it, for just a counthry place?"

Sneyd crouched as he was directed.

They had passed over on to the side of the hill which slopes away to the loch, and were keeping in a line more or less parallel to the shore. Now, the timber is gapped; but then, it was mostly as nature had planted it; and at the end of their six-mile tramp they were still in cover. They had come into a forest of Scotch firs, which ran from the Callart shore away up and up to that altitude which is known as the "tree-line;" and in its dark and melancholy aisles they found a safe asylum. Pushing through the thick covers had been a work of time, and, by the hour they brought up, it was nearly dusk.

The interlacing foliage above formed a dense canopy which, even in sunshine, on a clear day, threw the brown needle-strewn ground below into shadowy twilight; but now that the dark evergreens bore a deep burden of snow, save for the dim radiance which struggled through an interstice here and there, all was a deep and murky gloom. A pine wood, with its stiff straight trunks, and its desolate lower branches of dead wood, is never a cheering sight at the best of times. It will induce a gentle melancholy even in our liveliest hours; but when one's fortune is as those of these two fugitives were, the place is depressing in the extreme. Even O'Neill felt its influence. "'Tis worse than a wake widout the whisky, yer honour," he said. "But a man can get used to anything if he only lives long enough to learn, as me uncle said when the hangman hurt his ear wid the rope; and so here goes for buildin' a cabin."

A fork formed by two prone-lying giant trunks offered them a commencement, and by piling up branches and turf, and by scraping away the thick layers of mouldering woody débris from underneath, they had, in half-an-hour's time, a hut as snug as could be wished for, with a fire of resinous fir-cones and branches crackling merrily in front of them.

Now, fir-cones certainly do burn well, but they are not appetising to the palate even when roasted; and pineneedles make an excellent couch, but no one would dream of taking them internally; and now that kitchen, fireplace, and bedroom had been prepared, the two wanderers began to think keenly of supper. As Sneyd truly remarked, they were not likely to find a sheep there, and for his own part, he didn't see what on earth they were to do for a meal, except make up their minds to go without.

But O'Neill was more sanguine. "It's far too big a pain I've got in me belly to go to sleep," said he, "an', wid yer honour's lave, I'm off to forage for something to aise it with."

"If you think there's anything to be got, I'll come too."

"Wid due respect, best not," replied the Irishman. "Bad cess to me bringing up, there's a poaching cross in me blood, an' wid a night as dark as the inside of a haythen nigger, I'd be able to find me way about. Now yer honour'd be different. Once nicely away from the camp here, an' it's all Fermanagh to a Connemara stone-heap yez wouldn't be back till morning, if then. Just stay an' toast yer toes an' yer breeks at the fire, an' before yez can boast of a dry shirt to yer back, 'tis back I'll be av there's anything creeping widin three miles of us."

Digitized by Google

So, taking the pistols and recharging them carefully, the Irishman strode off into the darkness, and Sneyd, keenly anxious to contribute his share to the household comfort, climbed one of the slighter firs, and cutting from it a number of branches, stripped the thinner shoots from these, and arranged them on the floor of the hut, thereby forming a couple of luxurious, springy couches.

Meanwhile the storm howled remorselessly on. The more slender pine trunks swayed perpetually, and even the older and larger trees occasionally deigned to bow to the heavier squalls. Every now and again some branch, insufficiently buttressed up by its fellows, would crash down, and, letting fall an avalanche of snow, leave a window in the close-groined roof to light it in its descent.

Sneyd had but slender hope that the Irishman would be able to meet with any food, and at any-rate did not expect him back for a considerable time; and so, when a man appeared close beside him, having advanced unnoticed over the soft carpet of pine needles, he instinctively sprang to his feet, and laid a ready hand upon his sword-hilt. However, a cheery "All right, yer honour," reassured him, and he recognised his new comrade. The latter threw a burden from his shoulders to the ground. "That's a year-old doe," he said. "I came upon her upwind and unawares, broke her foreleg with a pistol shot, and then closed in and used my dirk. Red deer meat's just the thing for us."

He instinctively sprang to his feet and laid a ready hand on his sword hilt.

He had commenced skinning the animal as he was speaking, and soon had it denuded of its pelt. Then he eviscerated it, and proceeded to cut the flesh from the loin. After arranging the hot embers of the fire to suit his taste, he ashioned a couple of forked sticks to serve as grids, and giving Sneyd one, with instructions how to use it, he took the other himself, and followed suit.

The smell of roasting flesh rose on the cold night air, and Sneyd thought it the sweetest odour that had ever assailed his nostrils. He had not realised before, how hungry he was. And when his piece of meat was cooked enough to suit his fancy—rather underdone, I fear it was—he tackled it with his teeth, and felt that he had never known what it was to enjoy a meal before. That there was no salt, no bread, no plate, or knife and fork, little recked he. An empty belly wants none of these things to tempt it. Solid food is then in itself the height of luxury.

The pair of them ate to repletion, and, at the end of the meal, they laid themselves down on the springy beds of pine branches, and ruminated silently. O'Neill enjoyed the last pipeful of his tobacco. Sneyd mused dreamily for awhile over the events of the last few weeks, and then dropped off to sleep. The other puffed at his pipe, down to its last ashes, and dropped off also. And the pair of them snored in concert.

The sun was showing high through the pines when the ex-cornet of Sheridan's Horse next opened his eyes. The storm had ceased. Part of the snow was still perched on the branches overhead, but the most of it had either melted where it was, or fallen in small lumps to the earth. A dim, quiet light stole through the tree-tops and fell on the needle-strewn ground. But the view was still circumscribed. Whichever way one might look, straight brown trunks closed in the vista. Everything was a shade of brown—tree-trunks, dead branches, needles, cones—save for the dark green feathery branches overhead, and the few small patches of blue sky and fleecy cloud which here and there showed between them.

O'Neill was still lying open-mouthed on his back, snoring peacefully. He was a man of about the middle height, very squarely built, and heavily boned. There was no superfluous flesh upon him, yet a casual spectator would have called him fat, because of the wideness of his frame. He was one of those men who look strong, and who are a great deal more powerful than they appear. His face was typical of his country—with wide straight mouth, short tip-tilted nose, and merry blue eyes. There was sandy red hair on his head, and a red stubble on cheeks, upper lip, and chin. Artistically speaking, the man was no beauty, but his was a pleasant face, and a face that one would instinctively trust.

Digitized by Google

Remembering how little sleep the man had had of late, Sneyd did not wake him, especially as there was no reason why either of them should turn out just then. A fire would be dangerous in the daytime, as the blue smoke rising above the trees would betray their whereabouts; and, besides, they had cooked enough venison overnight to serve them for breakfast. No, there was absolutely no need to rise just then, and Sneyd himself was not loath to indulge in a still longer rest.

The Irishman opened his eyes at last, and, after making a meal of some of their cold meat, the pair of them fell to discussing what should be their next move.

"We're fairly safe from pursuit here at present, I take it," said Sneyd, "but we can't stay where we are for ever. I haven't much notion as to whereabouts we may be, but there are certain to be people in the neighbourhood, and sooner or later they must discover us."

"Sorra doubt about it, yer honour. What'll we do?"

"Slip cautiously down to the edge of the wood and reconnoitre."

"But why not reconnoitre from here?"

"Because we can't see through the trees."

"Thrue for yez; but we can see over 'em. Wait now. 'Tisn't every one of these trees I'd be afther sayin' I could climb, for there's many of them as big as a hogshead o' potheen in girth; an' though the bark's rough, it 'ud give way av yez swayed on it wid yer fingers. But see now, there's a thin chap there, an' av yez notice, his upper branches interlace wid the big fellow next door to him. So ye see, yer honour, I can swarm the wee fellow, lay out along the yard, in a manner of speaking, and then go hand-over fi-t up the rigging right up into the sky."

Sneyd nodded acquiescence, and the Irishman did as he had suggested, scrambling up with a seaman's activity, and pushing through a screen of the feathery dark green branches which closed after his passage and hid him from sight. He stayed up some ten or fifteen minutes, and then rejoined Sneyd on the ground.

"Well?" inquired the latter.

"Well, yer honour, the coach for the first stage is waiting for us to give the word to have horses put to and start. There's a loch* below us, wid an island† that holds a graveyard in the middle, an' a wee village on the other side. This side there's a sort o' low spit o' land running out, wid half-a-dozen houses on it; an' on the lee of that, there's a boat drawn up that's fit to carry us anywhere in rayson amongst the islands till we can come by a bigger."

"Then," said Sneyd, "as there's nothing to be done till nightfall, we may as well lie down again and snatch all the rest we can; there's no knowing when the next chance may come."

With that they settled themselves down on their beds once more, and dozed the day through. Night began to close in soon after four o'clock, and, as this was far too early to attempt their enterprise, they got the fire alight once more, and set to cooking all the remaining venison, partly as a meal for the present, partly as a provision for the future. There was no knowing how long their cruise might last, or how next they would be able to revictual themselves.

* Loch Leven.

† St. Mungo's Island. Burials still take place there.

He stayed up some ten or fifteen minutes.

About ten o'clock they moved leisurely down to the edge of the forest, struck the road which runs along the loch shore, and walked along it, holding themselves in readiness to dart into cover the moment any wayfarer put in an appearance. However, none seemed to be abroad, and the place was extremely desolate. They reached the shore where the boat lay, about midnight, and set to getting her in the water as quietly as possible. She was laden with herring nets, and these they left on the shingle. There was no need to take more than they wanted. Some people might have said that running off with the boat was nothing more nor less than robbery; but it must be remembered that fugitive soldiers, flying away to save their lives, are not apt to be straitlaced about such matters. The boat herself was not valuable—a rotten old craft of the skimming-dish pattern, with a couple of rude oars, and no other tackle—but, failing a better, she would serve their purpose. So they got in, and shoved off.

The tide was pretty slack in the bight where she lay, so with the two clumsy fisherman's oars they made fair way; but, once round the point, the full force of a fierce flood met them, and the boat steadfastly refused to make headway.

"Idjut that I was not to have known it!" muttered O'Neill. "The whole inner loch empties an' fills through this narrow gut, an' the water's racing in now like a mill-sluice. The ebb'll begin to make in a couple of hours, an' av I'd only had sense to wait, we'd ha' gone out then like a musket-shot."

However, by holding close in to the shore, they kept in the deader water, missing the full strength of the tide, which runs hardest in mid-channel, and by slow degrees

Digitized by Google

They . . . set to getting her in the water.

they worked the cumbersome old boat along. The strain was intense, but both stuck doggedly to the task, and brought every muscle to bear.

But ill fate awaited them. In the midst of one of his hardest pulls, the blade of Sneyd's oar caught in a tangle of seaweed, and he tumbled heels over head into the bottom of the boat, with the loom broken off short at the thole-pin.

Round came the boat like a walnut-shell in a flooded gutter, darting into mid-channel, and shooting straight down towards the inner loch. There was no spare oar on board, and, with the remaining one, they were helpless to turn her up against the stream. O'Neill shifted his heavy oar to the stern rowlock, so as to have some command over the boat in case of need.

Neither spoke. The current had got them helplessly in tow. Words could not improve matters, and so both remained grimly silent. They swept on past the Green Island and into the broader loch, and there the force of the stream was more or less dissipated. O'Neill headed the boat in towards St. Mungo's Island as though he were going to land there, but Sneyd, who was sitting on the forethwart peering through the darkness, said to him in a loud whisper, "Look over there to your right; wouldn't that craft suit us better? She's larger than this, at any rate."

"Yer honour's right, an' av we can get her we'll slip down wid the ebb in an hour's time, an' be able to cruise where we please. Kape quiet now, av yez plaze, and I'll lay this ould wreck alongside."

The vessel which had attracted their attention was a little coasting cutter of some ten or twelve tons; undecked, save for a small cuddy forward. O'Neill sculled his boat cleverly and quietly across to her, and, as he lay her on board, Sneyd made fast his painter round the cutter's starboard runner, and jumped quickly over the side.

Rapid as he was, O'Neill was before him. Hastening forward the Irishman made fast the little forehatch, and then came aft to Sneyd, who was standing on a heap of stones amidships, not knowing exactly what to do.

"It's in ballast she is, yer honour, an' so we may guess she's come in here for freight of some kind or other. If her people are on board, I've got 'em all snugly under hatches forrard. We can't risk the din of a scrimmage. If there ain't anybody, well an' good; if there be, why we can talk to 'em when we get fairly to sea. Meanwhile, we must just sit snugly down here on the ballast till the ebb begins to make, an' no body ashore'll be the wiser about our bein' aboard."

"And how shall we get out?"

"This ways, yer honour. Wind's fair for the narrows. As soon as she swings we'll get the anchor, an' let her drop down a quarter of a mile or so under bare poles. The breeze is stiff enough to give her steerage-way wid that, an' 'twould be risky to get any canvas on her here. Blocks will squeak, and if they did someone ashore might be poking his nose out of doors to see what we was after. But I'll get everything ready for hoisting, and as soon as we're nicely out of earshot we'll give her the canvas, an' be off an' away as fast as we can tear."

"Can you take her out through the narrows?"

"Wid any dacent luck, yer honour, yes. There'll likely be a bar, but, wid the tide almost bang full, there should be lashins of water for a wee boat like this. And then, once outside, we must find our way along as best we can. Yez have no notion, I suppose, where we should steer to?"

"Not an atom. The poor old Major headed down here on the strength of a rumour that the Prince's vessel was still in these waters. But where exactly she is supposed to be lying he didn't know, and neither do I."

"'Tis a bad lookout that, yer honour. The coasts here-away is a regular maze of islands, so I've heard tell, an' 'twould be a hunt for a needle in a bundle of hay, I fear, to go after her haphazard. However, we may pick up tidings. And if we don't, well we'll look after ourselves somehow. 'Twill go hard av a couple of able-bodied men—beggin' your honour's pardon for couplin' meself wid yez—with a stout little boat to their feet, either starve or get caught, when they don't want to do either."

"Oh," said Sneyd, laughing, "I wasn't in a funk at all. I don't doubt but what we'll pull through somehow, thanks to your skill. But still, it is best to have a definite plan, if possible. Can I give a hand at what you are doing?"

"Much obliged, yer honour, but it isn't worth while. It's just castin' off the tyers from the mainsail I am, an' there is but two. The forestaysail is lying on the deck there, wid the sheets ready bent on; an' the jib's stopped out along the bowsprit wid spunyarn, so that a good bowst on the halyards'll break it adrift aisy. We're all ready now when the tide serves."

"What about victualling?"

"Begob, I'd forgotten that. There's that bundle of deer's meat lying in the stern thwart of the other boat. No, sit you still, yer honour, I'll get it. See, there it is. I'll stow it in this locker aft. Here's a breaker, as I live! Ach, wather! and it's meself that'd forfeit me ten days' beard for just one wee half 'un o' potheen. Oh, wirra, wirra, 'tis a sad world this. I wonder what they've got stowed away in the wee cuddy there forard?"

"A rug or two maybe, and a regiment of fleas. But look, isn't she beginning to turn—what do you call it—swing?"

Digitized by Google

"Yer honour's right. It must be dead wather now. The ebb'll begin to make in ten minutes or so; an' when her nose turns nicely towards the narrows, we'll trip the anchor an' be off. I'll go forard and heave it short-a-peak, ready."

He got on to the little foredeck as he spoke, and began hauling in the hempen cable; and Sneyd, eager to be of some use, went after him, and was in the very act of laying hold on the rope behind him, when suddenly he leant down with a hand to his ear, and listened attentively.

"Hark!" he whispered, after a moment's pause, and the Irishman took a turn with the cable round the bitts, and listened too. "Isn't there somebody moving about ashore, over yonder? There they are again—rattling something over the stones."

"Be the powers, yer honour's right. 'Tis a boat they're shovin' down. There, hear the splash? Now they're heavin' a pair of oars into her. Here, give a hand at the cable. It's up and down, and the bottom's holding fast."

"They're rowing this way."

"The chaps that own the cutter coming to take her out with the ebb, by all that's blue. Heave on the cable, yer honour, for all your worth, or we must cut it. Come now—Yer-huh-he! Again now—Yer-ha-ha-hee! Hurroosh, there she comes; in wid her now, handsomely. Now, then, up staysail—there, she's away, steering herself like a witch. Up mainsail now. There's the throat-halyards. Rattle 'em in, up peak, and handsomely does it. Bad cess to it; there, she's coming up to the wind. Tumble aft, yer honour, and take the tiller. Hard a-weather wid it. No! to t'other side. That's right. There now, she has the mainsail. Helm amidships again, an' keep her steady so, whiles I run up the jib. There now, yer honour, give me the tiller, an' do you reprime your pistols. We mayn't want 'em, but 'tis best not to have 'em just flash if we do."

The boat astern had crept out from the shadow of the land leisurely enough. But, when she was in the open water, the man sitting in the stern made some remark which caused the two rowers to rest on their oars and turn round. They saw the cutter getting under weigh apparently of her own accord, and for the nonce their superstitious fears got the better of them. But when they got sight of two very substantial ghosts flitting about and hoisting canvas with all the speed they were capable of, then did those two rowers turn round and bend their backs to their work in downright earnest. Who the midnight pirates were, they probably had no idea; but, for all that, they were not animated by any particular love for them, and had a great desire to come up and argue for possession of the little vessel at close quarters.

At first the boat came up hand over fist. The breeze was light, and the clumsy little cutter moved but slowly through the water. The two fugitives saw this, and quickly held themselves and their weapons in readiness. There was a battering from the under side of the flimsy forecastle hatch which showed that they might also have other foes to contend with. But, to discourage the efforts of these last, Sneyd piled a good three hundredweight of stone on the little scuttle, and then came aft again.

The boat was still gaining upon them, but she was coming up more slowly. A stern chase is proverbially a long one, and the rowers were tiring after their first furious spurt; besides, their craft was heavy and tubby, and more intended to live in a heavy sea than to be pulled rapidly over smooth water. But notwithstanding this, it was unmistakable that she was drawing up, and as the men in her had settled down to a steady, dogged stroke, and were rowing as if they could keep it up for a week—or less—the chances seemed to point to their gaining their end in time. That is, if the wind did not freshen—as it appeared to have not the smallest intention of doing.

What the result would have been had the two parties come into collision, there could have been little doubt. Sneyd and O'Neil were both armed with lethal weapons, and were accustomed to using them. The others probably had their sailors' knives, and the boat's oars. They were three to one, certainly, but they would not have stood a chance.

The two fugitives had no fears on that score. They simply wished to avoid a combat, as wise men always will, when there is nothing to be gained by it. They had no grudge against the men they were depriving of their boat, and, besides, they wished to pass as ordinary thieves, and not to be recognised—even on suspicion—as fugitives from Culloden.

So when the wind, which is proverbially fickle, broke its promise of remaining light, and came down from the hills with some freshness, they rejoiced exceedingly, and saw the boat drop astern with feelings that were distinctly the reverse of regretful.

And so the little cutter and her freight passed through St. Peter's Strait with the first of the ebb, and ran down past Port na Mearlach and Ardshiel Point into broad Loch Linnhe.

CHAPTER IV.

How the boy came out of the forepeak; how he volunteered to pilot; and how the cruise to France was planned.

"Yer honour will know nothing of the mariner's trade?" O'Neill observed tentatively, when the cutter was well through the narrows into the open lake.

"Practically speaking, nothing. I can handle an oar and steer a row-boat, but that's all; so the sooner I set about learning the better 'twill be for me."

So Lawrence Sneyd received instruction in the noble art of steering a cutter with the wind free, and with Murtagh O'Neill at hand to prevent mistakes, he contrived not to execute an unpremediated jibe, or any other similarly objectionable manœuvre.

But, by the time they had rounded Ardshiel Point, the question of escaping from pursuit had been merged in that of where to go next. They had little fear of being overhauled; but their future course was a puzzle to them. Atlases were not as common on shore in those days as they are now, and neither had anything beyond a very vague notion of the topography of the neighbourhood which he found himself in.

When questioned upon the point, O'Neill scratched his red poll, with dubious forefinger. "'Twould be dangerous to go ashore and beg pilotage, for the wee craft is nigh certain to be known, and we'd be laid hands on an' strung up as pirates, without parley. An' 'tis dangerous work boxing about in these narrow waters. We might pick up a reef at any moment, in spite of the shrewdest look-out. 'Twill be bad enough in the daytime, but at night 'twould be impossible to go on. We must contrive to fetch up to an anchor somewhere."

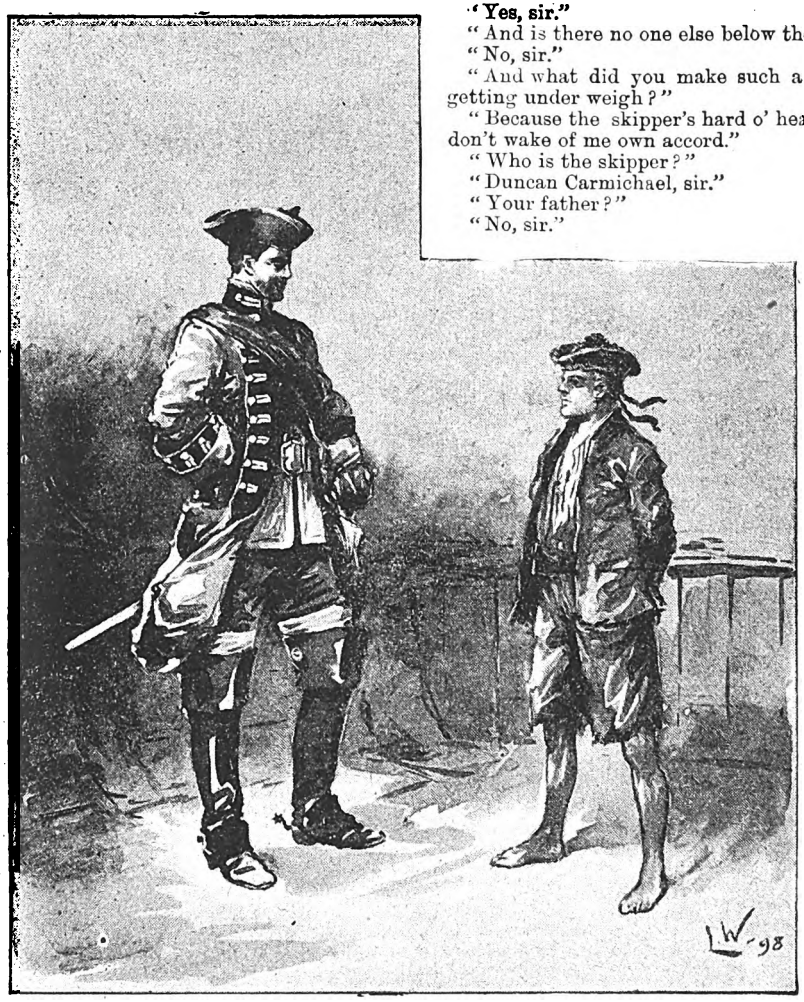
"Then you think it impossible to find the Prince's ship, even if she be here?"

The Irishman looked around him, and shrugged his shoulders. Sneyd followed his glance, and saw the hopelessness of such a search, situated as they were. The other continued: "O' course, yer honour, we might blunder on her, in a manner of speaking unexpectedly, an' then all would be well! but I think a search is out of the question."

"Then what would you suggest?"

"This, yer honour. There are islands all down the coast. Let us work our way slowly and carefully down inside them till we make the North of Ireland. When we get down by the Mull of Cantyre I shall know my way, for I've been South from Rathlin Island often; and once there, we can make further plans. Of course, we shall have to pick our way down carefully, so as not to blunder on to any reefs of shoals, though the danger would be more to the little cutter than ourselves. I'd say, get outside everything and sail her down in the blue water, but unless we were forced to it, that would be over venturesome. The wee boat is badly found for aught save simple coasting. She's neither chart that I can see, nor compass, nor lead, nor log ship."

Digitized by Google



"Are you Sandy Carmichael?"

"There may be something in the little cabin in the bows there. And, by Jove, there was some one in it!"

"By the powers, yer honour's right, an' it's meself that had forgotten him too. Have a care," he added, as Sneyd commenced pitching overboard the stones which he had piled on the forehatch, "there may be more than wan."

"All right," said Sneyd, slipping back a corner of the hatch and then sitting on it. "Hullo, below there! How many are there of ye?"

"There's nane but me," responded a voice.

"And who are you?"

"Sandy Carmichael, sir, an' I hope ye will na hurt me."

"Well, come up, Sandy Carmichael, and let's have a look at you," said Sneyd, slipping off the hatch altogether, and standing back upon his guard.

Forthwith up scrambled a small boy, with a prematurely old face, who tugged respectfully at a tattered bonnet which was pulled down well over his ears, and waited to be addressed.

Sneyd laughed. "Are you Sandy Carmichael?"

"Yes, sir."

"And is there no one else below there?"

"No, sir."

"And what did you make such a tremendous row for when we were getting under weigh?"

"Because the skipper's hard o' hearin', sir, an' he always licks me if I don't wake of me own accord."

"Who is the skipper?"

"Duncan Carmichael, sir."

"Your father?"

"No, sir."

"Uncle, then?"

"No, sir; he says he's my owner. He picked me up in a boat off the Irish coast when I was a wee bairn."

"H'm, wonder what you are now? Well, Sandy, we've run away with the cutter, and as you happened to be in it, we ran away with you too."

"Yes, sir."

"I hope you don't mind?"

The boy gave a short, hard laugh, which passed like a spasm across his face, leaving it stolid and wooden as before.

"No, I don't mind," he said.

"What are you laughing at?" Sneyd asked.

"'Cause you ask if I minded leavin' Duncan Carmichael, sir."

"Why, what was he like?"

"A brute, sir."

The boy said this without emotion. He made the statement as if it were a simple fact which could not be controverted; and Sneyd, after staring at him for a moment or two in surprise, slipped through the hatch into the forecastle. It was a grimy, malodorous little den, littered untidily with all sorts of odds and ends—ropes, blocks, pieces of mildewed sailcloth. In one angle was a rusty stove, with an iron pot hung beside it. On the bottom timbers of the boat were a couple of creel-fuls of peats. These were obviously intended as fuel. Meanwhile they served instead of floorboards in moderately light weather; though, when the cutter heeled over at all, it is probable that they all piled themselves up to leeward. Of food, there was not a vestige.

Sneyd put his head through the hatch again, glad to breath pure air once more. The boy had gone aft, and was staring solemnly at O'Neill. He was attired in a pair of short wide trousers of coarse grimy canvas, and a tattered coat of dark brown homespun. His legs were bare to the knee; his throat was bare and brown, and his shock of yellow hair was covered, as I have said, with a Scotch bonnet, pulled well down to the ears. As Sneyd came on deck the boy uttered a remark which gained him O'Neill for a friend at once.

"There's 'bacca in the locker you're sittin' on," he said.

The Irishman's pipe was out, filled, and lit, in less than a minute. "Sandy, boy," he said, "there's the makin's of a man in yez, av yez don't die of ould age before you're grown up. Laugh a bit, can't yez?"

The boy's face never moved a muscle. "I've forgotten how to laugh," he said. "Duncan Carmichael says it's wrong, an' used to welt me for laughin' when I was a bairn. So I dropped it."

"Well, you're a rum handful, you are. Hullo, here's his honour out again. Well, sir, an' did yez find anything worth packin' in a have-her-sack?"

Digitized by Google

"Nothing that I should fancy. Say, Sandy, what do you live upon here?"

"Fish, sir."

"Got any aboard?"

"No, sir. Catch 'em as we want 'em. Lines and hooks is in the after locker."

"H'm. That seems a primitive sort of proceeding. And supposing the fish don't bite?"

"Then we wait till they does, sir, an' has a drink o' water to stay the stomach with."

"Well, that beats all my goin' a-fishin'," exclaimed O'Neill. "And does your guv'nor—what's his name?—Duncan Carmichael—does he put up wid that sort o' livin', or does he have a dhrap o' the hard stuff to wash it down?"

"Hard stuff?" repeated the boy wonderingly.

"Yes, potheen. Come now, doesn't he have a drink of good potheen on board at times?"

"No," said the boy. "I never saw none. He has whuskey, though."

O'Neill chuckled. "That's the same thing as potheen, ye young haythen. It's yer education that's been sadly neglected, not to understand dacent English when yez hear it."

"Duncan Carmichael never teaches me anything," returned the boy, "'cept about working the cutter."

"An' what can yez do wid her?"

"Handle her by myself most weathers, and has to. Duncan Carmichael turns in and leaves me to it. He licks me when I rouse him up on deck; so I mostly let him lie, and carries on as far as the canvas'll stand. When it comes down hard I has to call him and take the lickin', 'cause, yo see, I ain't strong enough yet to snug her down by myself."

"Duncan Carmichael is a brute," said Sneyd. "I should like to treat him to a thundering good hiding."

"You'd best not let him come nigh you, sir," said the boy.

"Why ever not? Do you think he would be too strong for me?"

The boy avoided a direct answer. "You and Mr. O'Neill here are what they call Jacobites, ain't you, sir?"

"Well," said Sneyd, laughing, "it's rather a dangerous thing to admit just now; but I may say that we are, distinctly."

"Then," rejoined the boy, "I'd keep out of Duncan Carmichael's way if I was you. I don't know what Jacobite means, but I heard him say to a drover we had aboard yesterday, that if he could catch one he'd 'liver him up to them as wants him—meanin' the soldiers. He said there was a bonnet-fu' o' siller for every Jacobite as was handed over to 'em, and so he should consider it his duty as a Christian to grab as many as he was able."

"Sandy," said Sneyd, "you've taken a great weight off my mind. I had many scruples about running off with this boat. But after what you have told me, those scruples vanish. Duncan Carmichael is an enemy to my cause, and it gives me much pleasure to carry off his boat and turn it to my own uses."

"Then, sir," said the boy solemnly, "you'll carry me off as well, won't you? I'm his as well as the boat, and though I'm not so valuable, still I'm worth something, or he would have tripped me overboard on a dark night long since."

Sneyd looked at him curiously. The old, set face was without expression of any sort or description. The grey eye met his unflinchingly. Years of ill-treatment had not broke the lad's spirit; but they had taught him to repress his feelings.

"Sandy," he said kindly, "perhaps you mistake Duncan Carmichael's intentions. His manner is rough, but very likely he means well towards you. He wouldn't have kept you all these years else. As for coming with O'Neill and myself, I couldn't advise you to do it. We are men of desperate fortunes; outlaws with prices on our heads; and if you were caught in our company you would get into trouble too. The kindest thing we can do for you is to put you ashore somewhere hereabouts. You can walk to the nearest village, and hunt for a job. Believe me, if I could do better for you I'd do it."

The boy's face still wore its impassive look.

"Mr. O'Neill said, sir, you was here lookin' for a ship."

"And suppose we are?" replied Sneyd.

"The Prince's ship, sir?"

"Well?"

"Well, you won't find her, sir, that's all. We met her in Jura Sound three months back, heading to the s'uthard."

Sneyd and O'Neill exchanged a glance of disappointment.

"And then, sir," continued the boy, "Mr. O'Neill said that, if she didn't turn up, you'd head down to the Irish coast."

"Yez seem to have the ears of an ass, young man," said O'Neill.

A faint smile flickered across the boy's face. "An' neither of you knowed the way, sir."

"Well," said Sneyd, "what are you driving at?"

"Just this, sir, that you'll never find it alone. There's nothing on board to show it you but me. No chart, no compass, no anything. I've been down to Cawmelt'n wellnigh a score and a half o' times, and know every inch of the way—how the tides set at Easdale and the other places, and all the rest of it. Duncan Carmichael strapped it into me."

"What do you think, O'Neill?"

"I think we should take the pilot that's offered, yer honour, chance we don't get another."

"Very well, then," said Sneyd, "be it so. And now, then, to consider further. Supposing we get down to the Irish coast without mishap, what are we to do when we reach it? Nothing that I can see. In Ireland we should probably be in almost as much danger as we were in Lochaber. The Irish were in strong force with the Prince's army. My own colonel was an Irishman. The Elector's troops are sure to be in force there, and if we landed they would be wellnigh certain to have us by the heels before many days were past.

"Now what I've been thinking of is this: Could we contrive to navigate this little boat into a French port?"

O'Neill whistled long and low. "It's a large order, yer honour. For one thing, we're not rightly fitted for a cruise of that length. For another, the wee boat is full small for it. Ye see, we've neither instruments nor victual. Fishing may be all very well in these narrow waters, but it would be a slender reed to depend on in the open sea."

"We must land somewhere," said Sneyd, "and lift some sheep, and cure the meat either by salting or smoking it. Then we must overhaul some craft or other, and take from her, either by force or persuasion, barrels for our water, and a compass, and whatever else you want. And then, if you others are willing, we'll risk it."

"I'm yer man, sor," exclaimed O'Neill. "Sandy, lad, where's the convanientest place to stale sheep?"

"Charsaig Bay, in the Mull. Take 'em across and salt 'em down in Lowlan'man's Bay, in Jura. Snug anchorage there, and no one to interfere. Boil down salt in the kettle."

"Ye young villain, yez have been at this game before."

"Duncan Carmichael lifts a sheep or two occasionally, and sells the meat further up the coast," replied the lad unconcernedly.

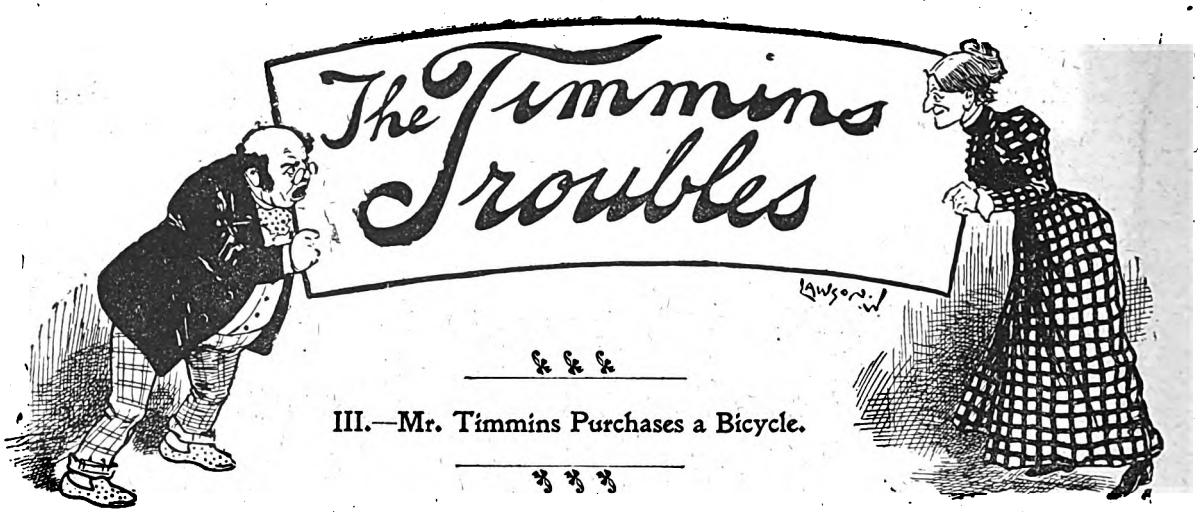
"Well," said Sneyd, "our morality is dubious, although the laws of warfare more or less defend it; but that is downright thieving. You ought to be ashamed of yourself."

"Duncan Carmichael was my master," said the lad, evidently considering that this was a sufficient reason for his action, and that no excuse was needed.

Sneyd and O'Neill exchanged a glance of pity, and the conversation ended.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



III.—Mr. Timmins Purchases a Bicycle.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, hurrying up to his wife's room, "if you'll come down in the yard I've got a pleasant surprise for you."

"What is it?" asked Mrs. Timmins; "what have you got—a horse?"

"Guess again," grinned Mr. Timmins, "it's something like a horse."

"I know. It's a new parlour carpet. That's what it is."

"No, it isn't either. I said it's something like a horse; that is, it goes when you make it. Guess again."

"Is it paint for the kitchen walls?" asked Mrs. Timmins innocently.

"No, and it isn't a hogshead of stove blacking, nor a set of dining-room furniture, nor seven gross of wash-tubs. Now guess again."

"Then it must be some lace curtains for the sitting-room windows. Isn't that splendid?" and Mrs. Timmins patted her husband on both cheeks and danced up and down with delight.

"It's a bicycle, that's what it is!" growled Mr. Timmins. "I bought it for exercise and I'm going to ride it. Come down and see me."

"Well, I am glad," ejaculated Mrs. Timmins. "You ought to have more exercise, and if there's exercise in anything it's in a bicycle. Do let's see it."

Mr. Timmins conducted his wife to the yard and descanted at length on the merits of the machine, which was an old "ordinary."

"In a few weeks' time I shall be able to go a mile a minute," he said, as he steadied the apparatus against the clothes post and prepared to mount. "Now, you watch me go to the end of this path."

He got a foot into one treadle and went head first into a flower-bed with a prodigious crash.

"Hadn't you better tie it up to the post until you get on?" suggested Mrs. Timmins.

"Leave me alone, will ye?" demanded Mr. Timmins, struggling to an even keel. "I'm doing most o' this myself. Now you hold on and keep your mouth shut. It takes a little practice, that's all."

Mr. Timmins mounted again and scuttled along four or five feet, and flopped over on the grass plot.

"That's splendid," commented Mrs. Timmins. "You've got the idea already. Let me hold it for you this time."

"If you've got any extra strength you hold your tongue!" growled Mr. Timmins. "It don't want any holding. It isn't alive. Stand back and give me room, now."

The third time Mr. Timmins ambled to the end of the path, and went down all in a heap among the flowerpots.

"That's too lovely for anything!" proclaimed Mrs. Timmins. "You went more than a mile a minute then."

"Come and take it off," roared Mr. Timmins. "Help me up!" and that worthy gentleman struggled and plunged like a whale in shallow water.

Mrs. Timmins assisted in righting him, and brushed him down.

"I know where you made your mistake," said she. "The little wheel ought to go first. Try it that way going back."

"Maybe you can ride this bicycle better than I can!" howled Mr. Timmins. "You know all about wheels! What you want now is a lantern in your mouth and ten minutes behind time to be Big Ben! Don't you see the big wheel has got to go first?"

"Yes, dear," murmured Mrs. Timmins, "but I thought if you practised with the little wheel at first, you wouldn't have so far to fall."

"Who fell?" demanded Mr. Timmins. "Didn't you see me step off? I tripped; that's all. Now you just watch me go back!"

Once more Mr. Timmins started, but the big wheel turned round and looked him in the face, and then began to stagger.

"Look out!" squealed Mrs. Timmins.

Mr. Timmins wrenched away and kicked and struggled, but it was of no avail. Down he came and the bicycle was a hopeless wreck.

"What d'you want to yell for?" he shrieked. "Couldn't you keep your mouth shut? What do you think you are—a foghorn?"

"Never mind, my dear," counselled Mrs. Timmins. "I'm afraid the exercise was too violent, and I'm rather glad you broke it."

"I suppose so," snorted Mr. Timmins. "There's £3 gone."

"Don't worry, love. I'll go without the carpet and curtains, and the paint will do well enough in the kitchen. Let me rub you with arnica."

But Mr. Timmins was too deeply grieved by his wife's conduct to accept any office at her hands, preferring to punish her by letting his wounds smart rather than to get well, and thereby relieve her of any anxiety she brought on herself by acting so outrageously under the circumstances.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S

100 BEST BOOKS. - - - -
100 MOST POPULAR BOOKS. - -
100 MOST ENTERTAINING BOOKS. -

NEARLY 60,000 PAGES OF READING. MANY HUNDREDS OF ILLUSTRATIONS, MAPS, PLANS, Etc.

ALL CLOTH BOUND FOR £7

FOR SOME considerable time we have been preparing a library of 100 volumes of the world's most famous books. The list set out on page 519 may not be beyond criticism. We have found it necessary to omit many volumes that at first sight should have been included, because the great mass of the public to whom this scheme is to appeal would not read them, and would not understand them if they did.

Take, for example, Spinoza's "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," Descartes' "Discours de la Methode," and others that might be named.

We have aimed primarily at giving good reading—books everybody should read and wants to read, and not books that once bought will be placed on a shelf and left for ever unopened. We are not selling furniture. Our books are selected to read, to educate, to amuse, to elevate.

TO THOSE WHO WANT 100 BOOKS FOR £7 10s.

Now our plan is this: If you want this set of books send us the order form below, and a postal order for ten shillings, and the whole set of one hundred volumes will pass into your possession. If there is any book or books in the 100 list you don't want, score them off, and place a cross against those in the "Extra" list you wish substituted.

TO THOSE WHO WANT 50 BOOKS FOR £4.

Send the order form, together with a postal order for 10s. Say whether we are to send you the books numbered 1 to 50, or 51 to 100. You may substitute books from the "Extra" List for those you don't want in the 50.

ANY PURCHASER WHO WISHES TO PAY the whole of the cash down can secure the one hundred books for £7, or fifty for £3 15s.

HOW TO OBTAIN 100 BEST BOOKS FREE!

Any reader who sends along ten of the coupons below, together with the names and addresses of the subscribers and the initial payments, will receive a complete set free of charge. If you want 100 books you must send ten order forms for 100 books; if you want 50 books you must send ten order forms for 50 books. You must not send some of each.

Monthly Payment Order Form for 100 Books.

Date .....

Please send me the hundred books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 20s. when I receive the hundred volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 20s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £7 10s. I engage that the volumes, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address .....

.....

Monthly Payment Order Form for 50 Books. List No.....

Date .....

Please send me the fifty books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 10s. when I receive the fifty volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 10s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £4 I engage that the books, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address .....

.....

For List of Books see Next Page.

Digitized by Google

100 BEST BOOKS.

FIRST FIFTY VOLUMES. No. 1.

1. Bacon's Essays. Including his Moral and Historical Works, The Advancement of Learning, &c: With Memoir.
2. Pope's Iliad of Homer. With Notes by Rev. T. A. Buckley. M.A., F.S.A. Illustrated with Flaxman's designs.
3. Pope's Odyssey of Homer. With Notes by Rev. T. A. Buckley, M.A., F.S.A. Illustrated with Flaxman's designs.
4. Shakespeare's Complete Works. The Plays, Poems, and Sonnets, together with Memoir and Glossary.
5. Spenser's Faerie Queen. With Memoir, Notes, etc.
6. AEsop's Fables. Translated by Croxall and L'Estrange. With 110 engravings.

7-10. Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. 4 vols.

11. Arabian Night's (The) Entertainments. Notes, etc.

12-15. Plutarch's Lives (Grecian). Agesilaus to Theseus.
" " (Grecian). Alexander to Timoleon.
" " (Roman). C. Gracchus to T. Q. Flaminius.
" " (Roman). Cato the Younger to Pompey the Great. Langhorne's Translation.

16. Horace, the Works of. The Odes, Epodes, Satires, and Epistles.
17. Dante, the Vision of. Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. Cary's translation.
18. Milton's (John) Poetical Works.
19. Pepys' Diary. 1659-1669. Edited by Lord Braybrooke.
20. Grimm's Fairy Tales. Translated by Mrs. H. B. Paull.
21. Don Quixote de la Mancha, Adventures of. Translated from the Spanish by Motteux.
22. The Ingoldsby Legends. By the Rev. R. H. Barham. Illustrated by Cruikshank and Leech.
23. Gems of National Poetry. Choice Extracts from the British Poets, from Chaucer to Tennyson. 1,000 selections.
24. Keble's Christian Year. Illustrated.

25-28. Half-Hours with the Best Authors. Edited by Charles Knight. 4 vols. A choice selection from the works of the most noted writers, prose and poetical, with brief biographical and critical notices.

29. Uncle Tom's Cabin. By Harriett Beecher Stowe.
30. Waverley. By Sir Walter Scott.
31. Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes. By Lord Lytton.
32. White's Natural History of Selborne. Edited, with Notes, by G. Christopher Davies, and Illustrated.
33. Robinson Crusoe (The Life and Adventures of). By Daniel Defoe. Illustrated.
34. Poe (E. A.) The Poems and Essays on Poetry, etc., and his Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym.
35. On Honour's Roll. Tales of Heroism in the Nineteenth Century.
36. Goethe's Faust. Translated by Bayard Taylor.
37. Jack Hinton. By Charles Lever.
38. Cowper's (William) Poetical Works.
39. Goldsmith's (Oliver), Poems, Dramas, and the Vicar of Wakefield.
40. The Scottish Chiefs. By Miss Porter.
41. Ben-Hur (A Tale of the Christ). By Lew Wallace.
42. The Koran — The Alkoran of Mohammed. Translated into English from the original Arabic, with Notes and a Preliminary Discourse. By George Sale.
43. Dryden's Poetical Works. With Memoir, Notes, etc.
44. England: Its Constitutional History. Edward I. to Henry VII., by Henry Hallam; and THE CONSTITUTION OF ENGLAND, by J. L. de Lolme.

45-47. Disraeli's (Isaac) Curiosities of Literature. With Notes by the Earl of Beaconsfield. 3 vols.

48. Byron's (Lord) Poetical Works.
49. Mary Barton. By Mrs. Gaskell.
50. The Last of the Mohicans. By J. Fenimore Cooper.

SEOQND FIFTY VOLUMES. No 2.

51. Longfellow's (Henry W.) Poetical Works.
52. Moore's (Thomas) Poetical Works.
53. Schiller's Poems and Ballads. Lytton's Translation.

54-56. The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By John Lothrop Motley. 3 vols.

57. Southey's Life of Wesley, and the Rise and Progress of Methodism.
58. Wordsworth's (William) Poetical Works.

59-60. Twice-told Tales. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. 2 vols.

61. Gil Blas, The Adventures of. By Le Sage. With Notes and Illustrations.
62. The Talmud (Selections from). Translated by H. Polano.
63. Virgil (Dryden's). (The Works of.) With life of Virgil.

64-67. Half-hours of English History. Edited by Charles Knight. 4 vols. (Selections from the Great Historical Writers, from the Roman Period to Queen Victoria.)

68. Harry Lorrequer. By Charles Lever.
69. Baron Munchausen (The Travels and Surprising Adventures of). Illustrated by George Cruikshank.
70. Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare. With numerous Illustrations.
71. Tales of Colonial Adventure. Illustrated.
72. Hood's (Thomas) Poetical Works. Complete.
73. Andersen's (Hans) Fairy Tales. Complete Edition.
74. Romance of History.—England. Henry Neele.
75. Romance of History.—France. Leitch Ritchie.
76. Romance of History.—India. By Rev. H. Caunter. (Romantic Tales founded on Facts in the History of these Countries.)
77. Heber's (Bishop) Poetical Works. Illustrated.
78. Jane Eyre. By Charlotte Brontë.
79. Shelley's (Percy Bysshe) Poetical Works.
80. Johnson's Lives of the Poets. With Critical Observations on their Works, etc., and Sketch of the Author's Life by Sir W. Scott.
81. Eastern Tales and Tales of the Genii. By many Story-Tellers.
82. Southey's Life of Nelson.

83-84. The Romance of London. Historic Sketches, Remarkable Duels, Notorious Highwaymen, Rogueries, Crimes and Punishments, &c. By John Timbs, F.S.A.
The Romance of London. Supernatural Stories, Sights and Shows, Strange Adventures, and Remarkable Persons. By John Timbs, F.S.A.

85. Lamb's (Charles) Poems and Essays of Elia. With Memoirs, &c.
86. Willmott's Poets of the Nineteenth Century. Illustrated by 130 Original Engravings.

87-92. Napier's Peninsula War. By Major-General Sir W. F. P. Napier, K.C.B. With fifty-five Maps and Plans. 6 vols.

93. Night and Morning. By Lord Lytton.
94. Sea Fights and Land Battles. From Sluys to the Bombardment of Alexandria, and from Hastings to the battles of the Soudan.
95. Whittier's (J. G.) Poetical Works. With Life and Notes.
96. Scott's (Sir Walter) Poetical Works.
97. Rory O'More. By Samuel Lover.
98. Keats' (John) Poetical Works.
99. The Spectator (Selections from). Edited by A. C. Ewald.
100. Burns' (Robert) Poetical Works.

TWENTY EXTRA VOLUMES.

1. David Copperfield. By Charles Dickens.
2. The Count of Monte Cristo. By Alexandre Dumas. Complete text.
3. Ivanhoe. Sir Walter Scott.
4. The Three Musketeers. By Alexandre Dumas.
5. Twenty Years After. By Alexandre Dumas.
6. Westward Ho! By Charles Kingsley
7. Walton and Cotton's Angler. A New Edition, with Notes by G. Christopher Davies, and Illustrations selected from Major's Beautiful Edition, etc.
8. Evelyn's Diary, 1641 — 1705-6. Edited by William Bray, Esq.
9. Roscoe's Italian Novelists.
10. " German Novelists.
11. " Spanish Novelists. (Choice stories and selections from the great novelists of these countries. Translated, with Critical and Biographical Notices by Thomas Roscoe.)
12. Christian Lyrics. (Sacred Poetry.) 200 Illustrations.
13. Mrs. E. B. Browning's Poetical WORKS. With Memoir, &c.
14. Hazlitt (William) Essayist and CRITIC. With Life. By Alex. Ireland.
15. Gibbon's Life and Letters. Autobiographic Memoirs of Edw. Gibbon, with his History of the Crusades.
16. Ernest Maltravers. By Lord Lytton.
17. Pope's (Alexander) Poetical WORKS.
18. J. R. Lowell's Poetical Works. With Notes, Memoir, &c.
19. Shirley. By Charlotte Brontë.
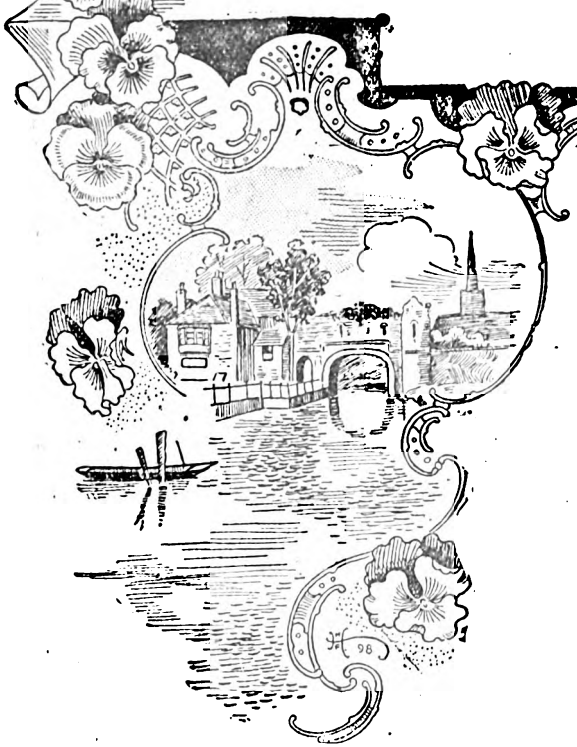
20. Men who have Made the Empire (From William, Duke of Normandy, to Cecil Rhodes of Rhodesia). By George Griffith. With Sixteen full page Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood.

Digitized by Google

A Strange Assault.



A TALL young man entered my dental rooms one December afternoon, and on being informed that I was busy, began to pace up and down the waiting-room.

I caught a glimpse of him now and then, and his restlessness so annoyed me that, when I was at liberty, I inquired what I could do for him rather impatiently.

He did not seem to notice my brusqueness, and asked abruptly:

"Do you fill teeth?"

"Certainly."

"Will you fill mine?"

"Of course; take a seat in the chair."

As the young man leant back and opened his mouth, I perceived that he was extremely nervous. His lips twitched, and his lower jaw shifted uneasily while I made my examination.

At length I said:

"Your teeth are in good condition with two exceptions—the lower molars are badly decayed, and need immediate attention."

"Yes," said he, "I am aware of that fact."

I prepared my instruments, and was about to begin operating, but was interrupted by my patient asking, in a low tone:

"Can you keep a secret, sir?"

"Yes," I replied, "my patients often entrust me with such things."

"Well," he continued seriously, ignoring my levity, "never mention to anybody that I have been here till the time comes."

"All right."

"Remember, till the time comes," he repeated earnestly.

By this time I had become convinced that my visitor was decidedly lacking in his mental qualities; he seemed to read my thoughts and said quickly:

"No, I am perfectly sane; and, furthermore, I haven't had a drop of liquor for over a week. You look like a man who can be trusted, and if you will do this work for me without asking questions, and consent to take a merely nominal fee, one year from now you will be handsomely repaid. Will you fill both those teeth, one of them with a diamond, for five shillings?"

I burst out laughing.

"My dear sir," I said, "you seem like a respectable man, but I wish you would cease talking in enigmas, and come to the point. In the first place, the price you offer is ridiculously low; and, besides, I don't happen to keep diamonds in stock as filling materials."

"Doubtless not, but here is one which will serve the purpose."

He fumbled in his waistcoat pocket, and produced a diamond which sparkled with much brilliancy.

"There is the gem," he said. "It is worth £20,000 to me."

I said nothing, but smiled inwardly; for the stone, although apparently a fine one, did not seem to me to be worth more than £50. My patient continued:

"Will it fit into one of those cavities and leave room for enough filling material to effectually conceal it, and prevent anyone but a dentist getting at it?"

"Yes," I replied, "the diamond is small, and the cavity in the left molar is quite large enough to hold it."

"The left one?"

"Yes."

"Well, go on, and get the job over as soon as possible."

I am not a believer in hypnotism, but some power that I could not explain made me do as the young man wished. I excavated the cavities and sealed up the diamond. In each instance the nerve had previously been killed. Neither of us spoke until the operation was completed. Then my patient said:

"Well, sir, I am exceedingly obliged to you. One year from to-day I will return, explain everything, and pay you twenty pounds in gold, providing that you will make affidavit as to what you have done."

Digitized by Google

"Very good," I said smiling as I bowed him out.

Naturally, I felt much curiosity regarding my strange customer. I thought at first that he might be a thief who had stolen the diamond. But such an idea was absurd. He looked honest enough, and then why should he come to me—a total stranger—if such were the case?

"Will!" I called.

"Yes, sir," responded my boy, with startling quickness. "What is it, sir?"

"Follow that man," I said, pointing to my mysterious caller, who had just reached the corner, "and let me know where he goes."

"Right," replied Will, seizing his cap, and he was off at a faster rate than I had ever known him to adopt.

He returned in about an hour, and said with a rueful countenance:

"I tried werry hard, sir, but he gave me the slip down Regent Street."

"How's that? You lost sight of him, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"You're a fine detective, and you took a long time to accomplish nothing," I said, with as fierce a look as I could command.

The spell which the young man seemed to have cast over me lasted for several hours. I was at work in a half-hearted way when a thought struck me like a blow.

I remembered that in my abstraction I had placed the diamond in the tooth on the right side instead of the left as I had at first intended. Both cavities had proved larger than I had at first anticipated. Of course, it did not really matter, but I had neglected to tell my patient about the change. He had gone away with the idea that his left side molar contained his much-valued diamond.

"Oh, well," I reflected philosophically, "what difference does it make? If he comes back I can extract the diamond, and if he goes somewhere else, it will serve him right for telling me a falsehood. Still, I doubt if I shall ever see man, tooth, or diamond again. I am several shillings out of pocket just because I was foolish enough to humour the whim of an eccentric individual."

About six months afterwards, Joe, the successor to Will, in the important position of general errand boy, announced that a "werry pretty lady" wanted to see me. I might as well explain here that the precocious Will had basely deserted me some time before, taking with him as souvenirs five pounds odd in money, some sheets of gold, and a few other articles belonging to my equipment.

My visitor had a worried look on her beautiful face.

"Are you Mr. Wilson?" she asked.

"I am."

"Do you know Mr. Albert Dawson?"

"I have no recollection of ever meeting a gentleman of that name."

"That is strange," she continued earnestly. "He seems to know you very well, and I have come to ask you to visit him."

"Why?"

"He has been terribly injured. Perhaps you read in this morning's paper of the singular assault on the Thames Embankment last night."

"No," I said; "I have not had time to look at the newspaper."

"Well," replied the young lady, "Mr. Dawson and I were returning from the theatre, and had reached a rather deserted spot, when suddenly two men sprang upon us, and while one held him, the other forced open his mouth and lacerated his tongue and cheek in a most terrible manner."

"Did they not attack you?"

"No, they did not," she replied, "and it seems very strange, because I had my purse in my hand at the time, and Mr. Dawson says he only had a few shillings in his pocket."

"Did they take anything from him?" I asked. I was much interested in my visitor's story, but still more in herself, for she had a most charming manner.

"Well, yes, but it seems almost too funny to mention it. Their only weapon, it appears, was a pair of dental forceps, and with these, in a most bungling manner, they managed to pull out one of Mr. Dawson's teeth. Then they made off at once. The whole affair took place in a few seconds."

A ray of light dawned on me.

"Is Mr. Dawson a tall man?" I asked.

"He is."

"Has he fair hair and large teeth?"

"Yes."

"All right; I will go with you. I think I remember him, although I did not recognise his name."

I was ushered into a well-furnished room, and at once recognised my mysterious client. He was sitting in an armchair, and his face was well covered with bandages. He was apparently in much pain, but smiled faintly as he recognised me. A servant who was in the apartment at my entrance withdrew, and as soon as the door was closed Mr. Dawson spoke: "Well, Mr. Wilson," he said faintly, "I'm in a pretty bad shape."

"I see you are," I returned; "but I hope it is not very serious."

"Oh, no," he said dolefully; "but it isn't the physical pain I mind so much. It's the loss of the diamond."

"Yes," I said, for the want of something better. I thought it best to allow him to talk, although it was with difficulty that he continued the conversation.

"I suppose you have wondered greatly why I had you to perform such a singular operation, and as everything is lost I think it best to explain the matter. My father is an exceedingly rich man, and I am his only son. Unfortunately, I fell into bad habits and became a victim of drink. My father did everything to stop my downward career, and finally reduced my allowance to next to nothing. So low, however, had I fallen, that I commenced to pawn everything I could lay hands on.

"Not to weary you, I hasten to tell you that this deplorable state of affairs continued until my twentieth birthday. On that occasion my father had a serious talk with me, and I was informed that by the will of my grandfather I had been left £20,000, to be given me at my majority. There was one condition attached to the bequest. My father handed me a small diamond, and stated that the jewel was to be kept on my person for one year. Should it pass out of my possession, the bequest was to be given to a charitable institution. As my father handed me the diamond he remarked sorrowfully that he had little hope of my keeping it.

"My emotions may be imagined. Even as I took the jewel I felt the horrible desire for drink come over me. My manhood, however, asserted itself. I walked out into the air with a terrible conflict raging within me. If I pawned the diamond, I would have enough money for a month or two, but how should I ever be able to redeem it? My father, as I have intimated, gave me little or nothing, my friends all fought shy of me, and I was incapable of work. In the midst of my reverie I passed your place, and a thought seized me. I entered, and you know the rest of the story."

I listened to Mr. Dawson's recital as he spoke with increasing difficulty, and rejoiced that I could so soon relieve his mind. Everything was clear to me. My errand-boy had evidently overheard my conversation with my mysterious patient. He had listened to our talk about a £20,000 diamond, and the tooth into which I intended to place it, and had informed some unscrupulous friend. The conspiracy had no doubt been formed carefully, and Mr. Dawson's movements were probably closely watched for a favourable opportunity to perform the robbery. The auspicious occasion had arrived on the previous night, and they had waylaid him and—extracted the wrong tooth.

I felt glad that my mistake had served Mr. Dawson such a good turn. Had I sealed up the diamond in the left molar, as I had informed him, my boy's rascally scheme would have succeeded. To make sure that my hopes were not based on false reasoning, I asked Mr. Dawson:

"Of course, it was the tooth on the left side of the jaw that the robbers extracted?"

"Yes," he replied sorrowfully, "it was. I suppose Miss Spring has told you all about the attack?"

"She has," I replied. My spirits fell when he told me the name of his fair friend. I had hoped she would have proved to be his sister.

"She is a girl in a thousand!" exclaimed my patient, with as much enthusiasm as his condition permitted. "Why, do you know, since I met her a month or so back, the desire for drink has completely left me. I feel sure that I could carry the diamond about me now with perfect safety; but alas, it is gone! I would not have my father know of this for all the world. I am at Miss Spring's residence, and her people insist that I shall not be moved for a day or two. Can you think of any way by which the diamond could be recovered without publicity? If we call in a detective, I fear that the story will leak out somehow. You befriended me once, that's why I have asked you to come now. Can you help me?"

"Entrust the matter to me," I said reassuringly. For some reason or other I felt inclined to prolong the conversation, probably that the joy of Mr. Dawson might be all the greater when I told him of the lucky error which had preserved the diamond.

"Do you think there is any chance of discovering the men?" he asked. Something in my manner seemed to give him hope.

"No," I replied, "not the least."

"Then what do you mean?" he returned, with much disappointment.

"Why, my dear sir, I mean just this. You have been labouring under a false impression, and fortunately the thieves have shared it with you. I was asked to place the diamond in the tooth on the left side. By mistake I put it in the right molar, and there it is at this very moment. All the robbers have for their trouble, is a large-sized tooth filled with amalgam in a very superior style, if I do say so myself."

As I made this revelation I laughed heartily and glanced at Mr. Dawson, expecting to enjoy the look of relief that would doubtless spread over such parts of his countenance as were visible.

To my great surprise he fell back with a groan of despair.

"You say that you put the diamond in the tooth on the right side?"

"Yes."

"Why, I had that tooth extracted three months ago when I was in Birmingham."

It was my turn now to get excited.

"You did?" was all I could say.

"Yes. I was there on a trip, and I met with a slight accident and loosened that tooth, so I had it out."

"What was the name of the dentist?"

"I have completely forgotten, but I remember the street and number."

"What was it?"

Mr. Dawson gave me the address and I took the next train for Birmingham. All my efforts were in vain, however. The dentist who extracted the tooth made a habit of throwing away such results of his skill. The dental organ with its £20,000 secret was doubtless submerged in some ash-heap.

There it may be to this day. Mr. Dawson's expected legacy went to the "Home for the Relief of Crippled Orphans," and a dozen other worthy objects.

Mr. Dawson, however, married Miss Spring, and by the last account was living very happily, having by his good conduct regained the favour of his father.

M. E. McDERMOT.

TWENTY £25 NOTES OFFERED.

THIS MAGNIFICENT OFFER is made by the Editor of Pearson's Weekly for one week only. Particulars of it will be found in the Christmas Double Number, published on Thursday, December 22nd.

It is necessary to comply with the conditions; you should, therefore, not fail to secure a copy of the paper at once.

In addition to this, the Christmas Double Number of P. W. contains the opening chapters of a new serial story, entitled "Cold Steel," by Mr. M. P. Shiel, an instalment of a splendid story entitled "Bunderby's Boys and I," by Arnold Golsworthy, profusely illustrated by Tom Browne, half-a-dozen complete short stories, well illustrated, besides numerous articles, and prizes of £1,000, £100, and £25 in a football competition.

Digitized by Google

The - Final - War.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

CHAPTER XLIV.

The Battle of Kharkof.

It was in Russia that events marched with dramatic sequence.

Whilst the struggle for possession of Petrovsk on the Caspian was taking place, telegraphic instructions reached the Grand Duke Paul to the effect that he was to cross the Caucasus with as many men as possible, and fall upon the British flank or rear. He explained that no effective force could possibly reach Vladikavkaz from Tiflis, by the post road over the mountains, under a fortnight, as his stores and the greater number of his troops were concentrated at Baku.

Discussion on the point was cut short by the seizure of the telegraph line by the British, but Duke Paul loyally strove to obey the directions received from St. Petersburg.

His disheartened and weary men only gained the Kazbek Pass to find it impregnably fortified against them by a strong brigade detached from the Madras army for this particular duty. In vain they strove to pierce the barrier of rock and Maxim guns. The fighting was fierce and unceasing, and as it transpired, the last lives spent in the campaign were given in this magnificent but gloomy gorge.

With the base thus secured, and an excellent railway at his disposal, Sir George White had only ordinary difficulties to surmount in joining his forces with those of Lord Methuen at Rostof and Taganrog.

The exact plan of campaign now began to unfold itself, but to note its salient details the reader should consult a modern map of European Russia.

The military strength of this great country was centered in three distinct localities, at Moscow, along the line of the river Dniester, including the Crimea, and south of the Caucasian range. Of course St. Petersburg, Poland, and the Austrian frontier were also held by great army corps, but there were many good and convincing reasons, which will presently appear, why the two former localities should not be denuded of troops, and on Austria a very watchful eye must be kept, for the successes achieved by England and the United States were quickening her pulses and stirring her ambitions.

The fighting was fierce and unceasing.

Away in the far east of Siberia, Canadian and American forces were encamped at Vladivostock and Nikolaievsk, whilst it was felt that the Baltic must soon be the scene of far-reaching events when the British and American fleets opened fire upon the defences of the Neva.

Sir George White, who now took supreme command of the combined armies in Southern Russia, knew, therefore, that the principal portion of the problem before him was to meet the enemy under those conditions most likely to achieve success in the first great battle.

The army of the Caucacus was practically non-existent. Sir Charles Warren's army corps, securely posted at Kremenchug on the Dneiper, held secure the chief river and rail routes from western and north-western Russia, and the Commander-in-Chief was left to deal with the divisions hastily placed on a war footing at Moscow, Orel, Tambof, Kursk, and Kharkof.

In all, he expected to meet 400,000 men, and to oppose them he had 280,000. The personnel of his troops, however, atoned for the relative paucity of their numbers. The severe hardships of the advance from India had weeded out the weak and sickly ones, and the contingent led by Lord Methuen was fully up to the standard of the superb army which had crossed the Caspian.

Officers and men were filled with quiet enthusiasm, whilst the daily receipt of encouraging news from the other centres of operations in France and Germany filled them with a keen desire to cross swords with the enemy under the strenuous conditions imposed upon their comrades elsewhere.

The Russians, taught by the experiences of their allies, did not seek to hurl themselves in small sections upon the invaders.

So precarious was the political condition of the country, and so excited was public feeling by the trend of events, that the Tsar and his advisers fully realised the imperative necessity there was for a crushing victory over the English at the first available opportunity.

Absolutely unprepared as they were for an attack in the vital quarter in which it had developed, they found the delays and anxieties of effective mobilisation almost as trying as Sir George White's progress through a barren country, filled with a sullen if not actively hostile population.

It soon became evident that the crucial struggle of the campaign would take place in the neighbourhood of Kharkof, a large town on the river of that name, and its tributary, the Lopani. Kharkof may be regarded as the commercial capital of Southern Russia.

The leading divisions of both armies had already met in the locality, but the commanders had received strict injunctions to avoid a serious encounter. Concentration and analysis of strength were the objects aimed at, alike by Sir George White, and his redoubtable opponent, General Kouropatkin.

Each wished to take the measure of the other before throwing the die which was to determine the tremendous stake at issue between them. Each felt intuitively that the future history of the campaign would be greatly influenced by the result of the impending battle, but neither of them knew the scope of the drama being played at that moment in Russia—a playing with empires in which they were but notable actors.

At last, towards the close of a sweltering August day, when the air was still tremulous with heat, and even the natives in the Indian Army growled about the supply of ice falling off owing to the difficulty of transporting the machinery, Sir George White found himself within striking distance of Kharkof.

From the heights through which ran the river Lopani, he could plainly see the tents of the Russian host, and the

Digitized by Google

Intelligence Department soon provided him with reports that showed the disposition and numerical superiority of the enemy.

The British army was composed of eight divisions of 30,000 men in each, and these again were split up into five brigades. The first division, commanded by Lieutenant-General George Nicholas Channer, V.C., had been in position near Kharkof for some days, and had succeeded in blowing up a tunnel which carried the line from Kharkof to Taganrog through a precipitous and otherwise inaccessible mountain barrier which protected the British left from attack.

Sir George White . . . . earnestly examined the Russians.

The first and second divisions were stationed in the comparatively narrow valley through which the Kharkof river flows, somewhat in front of the confluence of that shallow stream with a small rivulet. The remainder of the army, with the guns and cavalry, were grouped on the more open ground which forms the watershed of the river Lopani, and there could be little doubt that in this confined space—for the front of the entire army did not spread over four miles—would be fought one of the most stubborn battles of modern days.

Sir George White, surrounded by his staff, passed the brief hours of declining light in earnestly examining the Russians.

To his trained eye it was quite evident that they were yet in a state of unpreparedness, and he said in a relieved tone whilst discussing the matter:

"I am glad that the attack will probably be delayed. It will give me time to think and the men time to rest."

He summoned a Council of War for ten o'clock, and, after an early meal, retired to his quarters, demanding complete seclusion until the hour approached for the assembly of the chiefs of divisions.

When this brilliant collection of distinguished soldiers had gathered round the Commander-in-Chief, it was seen that there were present Lord Methuen, as second in command, Major-Generals Sir G. B. Wolseley, Sir A. P. Grant, Alexander A. A. Kinloch, G. N. Channer, V.C., Sir Robert Low, Sir R. C. Stewart, W. Galbraith and W. F. Gatacre. Major-General H. F. Grant commanded the cavalry as a whole, and Major-General H. C. Lewes, the artillery.

Sir George White quickly placed them in possession of his views.

"I feel convinced," he said, "that our best plan of action is to await attack by the enemy. We are outnumbered by nearly two to one, and the broken nature of the country renders rapid co-operation of guns and cavalry with our infantry attack almost impossible. This fact also tells in our favour in minimising the superiority of the enemy in those arms.

"They, of course, like ourselves, have heard details of the principal battles in France, and know quite well that Lord Roberts has invariably commenced his operations in the dark or just before dawn. Kouropatkin will expect us to follow the same rule, and will await attack during the whole of this night.

"I have arranged that his rest shall be sufficiently disturbed by strong patrols along the front. To-morrow his men will be tired after the night's vigil, and he will probably endeavour to bring his strong artillery arm into effective use. It will be for you, Lewes, to see that he is kept fully occupied in this matter."

Major-General Lewes nodded affably.

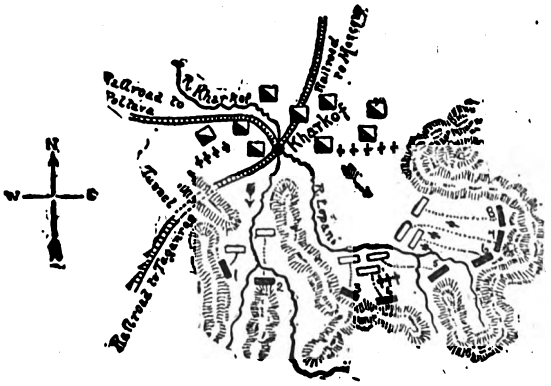
"If we still make no move I feel assured," continued the Commander-in-Chief, "that Kouropatkin will himself attack under cover of the night. His officers, of course, know the ground well, and it is conceivable that they may imagine we feel ourselves incapable of meeting them upon equal terms."

A quaint smile flitted round the Council at this instance of frail reasoning on the part of the enemy.

"We must see to it that our men are thoroughly rested and well fed during the day. As soon as the dusk cloaks our movements, each division will retire upon a special position assigned to it and marked here upon a sketch map of the two valleys prepared by the Intelligence Department. During to-night a comprehensive scheme will be prepared by that department, and handed to all brigadiers and commanding officers of regiments, so that there should be no confusion, or undue haste, or unnecessary delay.

"The object of this change of position will, no doubt, gentlemen, be quite clear to you. If Kouropatkin groups his dense columns with the intention of striking heavy blows at us in a definite locality, he will be completely nonplussed if there is nothing to hit at when he gets there."

And now Sir George White spoke very slowly and impressively. "It may be regarded as certain," he said, "that the advance will nevertheless be maintained, but with irresolution and anxiety in place of the confidence of the opening movement. If this be so, we can count upon accomplishing the first effective development ourselves; on the other hand, if Kouropatkin retires, we will follow up and give battle at dawn on the outskirts of Kharkof." The Commander-in-Chief paused, and a buzz of conversation at once rose, whilst the officers gathered round the large scale sketch-map, a small reproduction of which is given here.



PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF KHARKOF.

THE ARROWS SHOW THE LINES OF THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

A Russian division of 40,000 infantry with 3,000 cavalry and 100 guns. Nine divisions in all, but only 400 guns were used in the preliminary action.

Represent British and Russian guns.

An English division of 30,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry. Eight divisions in all, with 340 guns. Each division is numbered, and the position shown is that occupied during the day.

The same division at night, the dotted lines marking the line of march.

The Battery of Maxims stood in a semi-circle on the high ground behind division No. 5. Scale 2 miles to 1 inch.

Major-General Kinloch, who is perhaps the tallest man in the British army, and notable throughout India as a sportsman who never shoots a bear, but stabs him with a short hogspear, commanded the 5th Division, and forthwith expressed his satisfaction with the arrangements.

Digitized by Google

"If everything comes off as you predict, and I fully agree with your forecast, I ought to get a good share of the ultimate attack," he said to Sir George White, pointing to the position occupied by his corps on the map.

Kouropatkin . . . . hurried forward to ascertain what was the matter.

"Yes," said the Chief with a smile. "I thought you would notice that fact. Indeed, I intend to remain with you myself during the night, and I have caused the field telegraph to be centred there."

If General Kouropatkin had subjected his brain to a species of "X" rays, warranted to reveal the thoughts, his ideas could not have been more exactly made known to the British leader.

To tell the truth, he scoffed most loudly at the pusillanimity of the English in not venturing to attack him, and he was bitterly annoyed at the manner in which his artillery was held in check, and even badly knocked about by the magnificent service of the British gunners.

All through the baking heat of the day he eagerly watched for developments, but none came, and as night fell he gave orders for arrangements to be made for a general advance, timed to be effective about midnight.

Two divisions were to carry the British left in the Kharkof Valley, and then cross the low hills which intervened between this river and its neighbour, the Lopani. A third division would follow in support, chiefly to aid in the flanking movement directed against the British centre and main body, which would be assaulted in front by three divisions, two others acting as supports. The remaining division would hold Kharkof, being deemed superfluous for the task in hand.

At 11.30 p.m. the advance guard of the leading Muscovite divisions came in touch with the British vedettes.

These latter steadily retired, and, a few minutes later, the Russian officers halted their men to form them up for the final rush upon the British lines. The final rush was duly delivered, and spent itself upon thin air, to the intense amazement of the brigadiers.

Astounded to hear little or no firing, Kouropatkin, who was with the first body of supports in the centre attack along the Lopani flats, hurried forward to ascertain what was the matter.

He quickly decided that the British were in full retreat before him, and gave imperative orders that the advance was to proceed with the utmost celerity.

At twelve o'clock some desultory firing in front stirred the leading battalions to again stumble on at top speed in the darkness, but they met with equal disappointment.

By this time confusion, irregularity, uncertainty of formation, and loss of discipline, began to take serious effect upon the Russians. But they poured blindly on in disorganised hordes, and instead of turning to the south-east along the broad reaches of the valley, they streamed across the Lopani river, and blundered right on top of Kinloch's division before they knew that an enemy was in the locality.

A short and sharp bayonet charge by the 2nd Battalion of the Manchester Regiment and the 2nd Battalion of the Durham Light Infantry, enlightened them considerably, and two brigades, more frightened than hurt, staggered back across the shallow, boulder-strewn river. Kouropatkin now sent off nearly every member of his staff to order a general halt, and to hurry up the rocket apparatus.

This took some time in fulfilment, but the British troops never moved, nor did they show the slightest sign of their presence elsewhere than in the precise spot where they had been discovered.

Sir George White stuck rigidly to his theory. He knew that under existing conditions the Russian supports and reserves must be fast crowding on the fighting line, thus seriously discounting their tactical value. No other battle in which such large numbers of men were engaged had been confined to so small an area, and it was precisely this consideration that he aimed at.

Shortly before one o'clock a rocket hissed into the sky, and bursting over the slopes occupied by the 5th Division, revealed fully the nature of their position. Other rockets followed, and Kouropatkin found out the location of the whole British centre and right.

Whilst he was hurriedly striving to organise an attack in force along the entire front, the Russians underwent the most terrible experience that any army was ever subjected to. Not even the Plevna redoubt was the scene of such carnage as was effected during the next half-hour.

On the hill behind Kinloch's corps sixty Maxims and seven batteries of artillery had been arranged in a crescent, so as to command the whole plateau inclosed by the angle of the Lopani.

The guns fired shrapnel by guess-work, and destructive enough they were, but with the Maxims, by means of their sighting appliances, the element of human miscalculation was entirely eliminated.

These valuable weapons can be trained, during daylight, to sweep a definite area of ground both in length and depth, and fixed by means of indicators which prevent them from ranging beyond the predetermined limits. They fire 200 bullets per minute when in full swing.

Upon the Russian troops, crowded together in dense masses, a pitiless storm of lead, averaging nearly 12,000 bullets per minute, rained ceaselessly from the heights, whilst the artillery added terror to the more silent havoc thus caused in the darkness by sending salvoes of shrapnel shrieking and tearing through the ranks.

Every few seconds a rocket flew over the Russian host, shedding a fitful and supernatural light over the scene, and seeming, by its mere radiance, to render the holocaust of death more awful and more widespread.

Kouropatkin knew that the sole hope of extricating his army from its disastrous predicament lay in a successful general attack upon the British position.

With the desperate courage of despair, he devoted himself to this object, and at last managed to secure a combined advance on the six English divisions.

He reached Sir A. P. Grant in time.

It was at this stage of the battle that a chance Russian bullet smashed the telegraph instrument communicating with the 1st and 2nd Divisions on the left wing, and for nearly an hour no communication could be held with Channer or Gatacre who commanded there.

That stray ounce of lead gave Lieutenant Rodney his V. C.

The Russian advance along the Kharkof Valley, narrower and less practicable than the watershed of the Lopani, was considerably delayed by the natural difficulties of the ground.

Failing to find the British where he expected them, and hearing sounds of a heavy engagement on the other side of the hill, the Russian commander thought that the whole British force was to be found there, and at once changed his direction in order to cross the hill and delivered a flank attack on the British in aid of Kouropatkin.

Digitized by Google

Some time elapsed before Channer discovered this serious development, and although he was able to communicate it to Gatacre, they were quite powerless to inform the Commander-in-chief.

Both generals forthwith resolved to depart from their instructions and attack the Russians, but valuable time had been lost, and, if possible, Sir George White should learn what was going on.

It was impracticable to reach the British lines from the rear owing to the ravines and precipitous gorges that separated the two forces on that side, and the only way was over the hill now being crossed by the Russians and along the left bank of the Lopani, through the Russian fighting line, until the third division was reached.

Major-General Channer called for volunteers to take the message, and Rodney and five other officers were selected to make the attempt individually.

Rodney was the only one of the six who got through. He had lost his helmet, his tunic was slashed with sabre cuts, his left riding-boot was torn with a lance, and his horse bleeding from several wounds, but he reached Sir A. P. Grant in time for the latter to swing half his division round to meet the new attack.

Half dead with fatigue—for he had been working hard all day, and this daring ride was no small addition to his labour—he managed to mount a fresh horse, and proceeded in comparative safety to headquarters, where he was warmly thanked by Sir George White for his splendid achievement.

Dawn was now breaking over the field, and the end was near.

The only bit of solid fighting done by the Russians was on the right, where they certainly gave the divisions led by Sir A. P. Grant, Channer, and Gatacre, some trouble to beat them.

For the rest, a general advance of the British line converted a feeble resistance into a wild rout. The cavalry and guns took up the pursuit, and the remnants of Kouropatkin's force fled to the town of Kharkof, or were dissipated over the steppes to the north.

Leaving nothing to chance, for a fresh and powerful division, with the whole of the Russian guns and cavalry, still held the town, the Commander-in-Chief lost no time in preparing to carry the place by assault.

A fresh battle appeared to be imminent, and the artillery were already taking up position to begin shelling the fort at the confluence of the rivers, when a Russian officer, carrying a flag of truce, was seen riding at top speed towards the British lines.

"It is a ruse to delay us," said a member of the Commander-in-Chief's staff.

"If it be," said Sir George, "it will not avail them long. Meanwhile sound the 'Cease fire.'"

The envoy was speedily brought to the Chief.

"I am sent by General Kouropatkin," he said in English, "to arrange terms of capitulation."

"Any terms must be unconditional," was the brief response.

"General Kouropatkin thought that you would give no other reply," said the officer sadly. "In explanation of his action and desires, he sends you this translation of a telegram he has just received from Moscow."

Sir George White read the paper handed to him.

He started with genuine amazement when he had mastered its contents, the full purport of which he seemed at first unable to realise.

After a long pause, during which the staff marvelled at the deep concern and bewilderment of the Chief's expression, he said to the envoy:

"Convey to General Kouropatkin the assurances of my keen sympathy, and say that I will meet him immediately to discuss the situation."

The officer saluted, and rode off.

Then Sir George White read the telegram aloud to his staff, adding the memorable words:

"So far as Russia is concerned, gentlemen, the war is over."

CHAPTER XLV.

The End of the Romanoffs.

"Has he come yet?"

"No, Petrof, have a little patience. The Little Father won't keep you long."

"Ah! No! Not long! Not long—now! But it has been weary waiting."

"By the Prophet, we are impatient this morning. Here, come a little more to the front. You won't be so crushed. And why so anxious?"

"Don't you know? Are your eyes closed; are your ears heavy? It is a bitter day for our Little Father. Yes. The Romanoffs are nearly run to earth. A few hours longer—a few hours!"

The officer saluted.

"Hey? What do you mean, Petrof?"

"Silence, there!"

And with this gruff command there fell on the shoulders of the lusty moujik who asked the question a blow from the shaft of a lance. A mounted soldier passing along vainly seeking to maintain order, had overheard them. The little group scowled as he rode on and looked at each other with meaning glances.

The streets of Moscow were crowded with eager throngs. The Tsar was about to enter in. Everyone knew that: the word had been passed round mysteriously in the morning. He had suddenly left St. Petersburg, alarmed at the news of growing calamity, and had hastened down to the old capital to meet his brother, and throw himself into the centre of operations. The whole city was in a ferment of excitement.

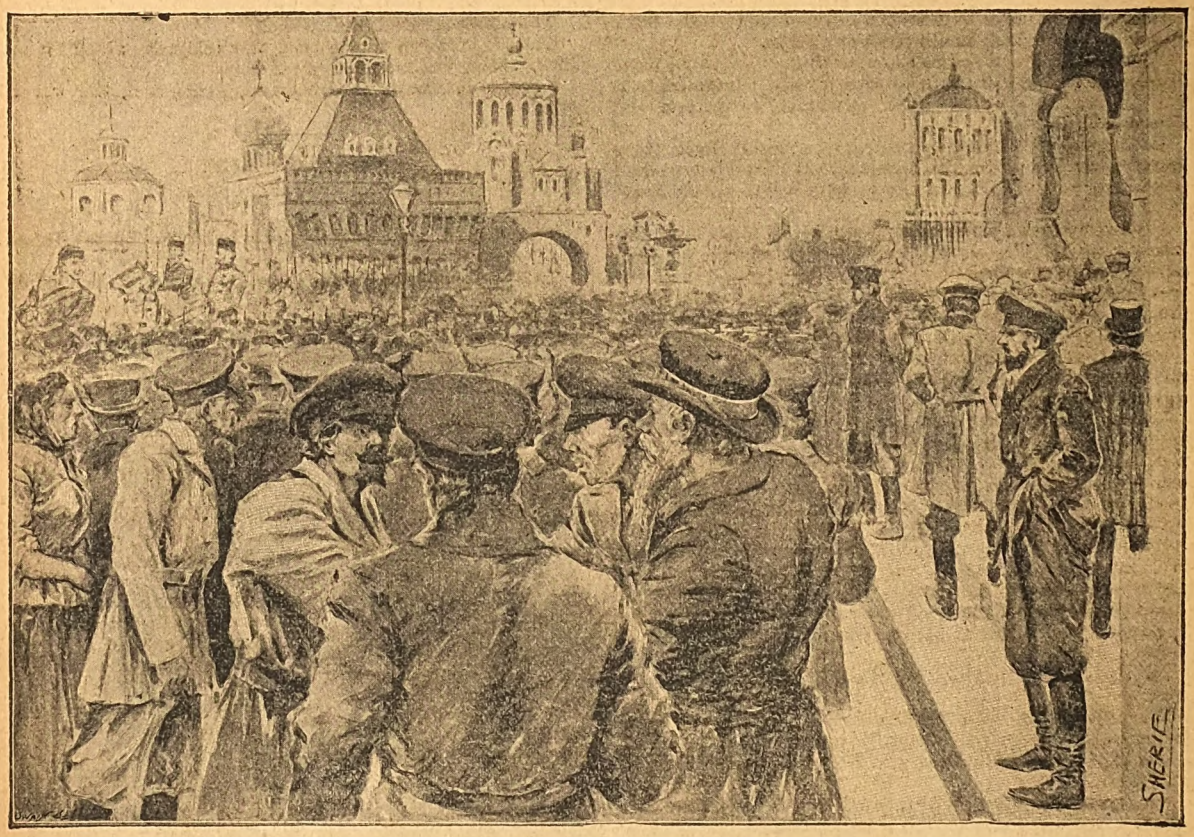
For news of late had been amazing, stupendous. Scarcely had the terrible announcement come that the English had beaten the Asian army and had forced its way to Russian soil, than another and still more miraculous event convulsed the whole nation.

Seven days after the remarkable meeting at the Grand Duke Paul's house, the storm that had been so slowly gathering within the Russian dominions gained head, and burst with impetuous fury upon the crown. The Nihilists had risen, not in isolated localities, not with the ineffectual despair of scanty numbers, but simultaneously, multitudinously, in a single moment, and in every quarter.

The first tidings that came to St. Petersburg were sufficiently embarrassing. They announced the revolt of the southern provinces. With ready firmness and dispatch that danger, at least, might be effectually crushed; but scarcely had General Gourko time to make his first hasty arrangements, than fresh intelligence of disaster, growing worse and worse every moment, rained in upon him from all points. It staggered and confused him, for he found that he had at last to contend, not with a conspiracy, but with a nation.

Count Lucovitch had planned his operations well. Whilst the whole available Russian army was hastening to meet the British at Kharkof, and was already engaged, beyond its capacity, with the invincible army of India, a countless host of eager and reckless rebels, resolved to stake everything upon the one decisive blow for their country's freedom, sprang from concealment and hastened in

Digitized by Google



As he rode slowly through the crowded streets, it was ominous to notice that there was no clamour of welcome.

impetuous march—made more triumphant at every step from the easy victories obtained, and the constant reinforcements gathered from the districts through which they passed—to the three chief cities of the empire.

There was little or no resistance; indeed, none was possible. The path of the insurgents was scarcely defended. They were met by blessings rather than by musket-shots, and with incredible rapidity made their way to the seats of Imperial government. It was then that the Tsar, desperate, yet fearless, resolved to throw himself into Moscow, his ancient and sacred capital, the strongest of all his citadels. There, too, summoned hastily together, were gathered the heads of the Romanoff family and one or two of his trusted generals.

At last, about five o'clock, the gleam of arms in the distance betokened the arrival of the Imperial party at the railway station. A sudden hush came over the excited multitude. The Tsar rode at the head of his guards, accompanied by Gourko. His look was still haughty, and there was in it a strange expression of mingled anxiety and disdain. How would his Capital receive him? This torturing thought filled him with distraction.

As he rode slowly through the crowded streets, it was ominous to notice that there was no clamour of welcome, none of that popular enthusiasm which greets a ruler who comes amongst his people. His city of Moscow gazed upon the Imperial cavalcade in sullen silence, broken only by the low murmuring of subdued voices. The Tsar's brow darkened as he marked this significant fact, and his eye glittered with the fierce fire of royal anger.

"These dogs need whipping to their kennels," he exclaimed to Gourko.

"Pray Heaven the day is near when your Majesty may be able to punish them for their impious disloyalty," replied the minister, whose mind was heavy with foreboding. "Meanwhile, pardon an old servant's license when I earnestly recommend your Majesty to humour these cowards. We must take no wrong step just now. If your Majesty would deign not to notice——"

"There shall be no more submission or pretence," hastily interjected the Tsar. "The Romanoffs are not accustomed to play-act before their subjects. I will be monarch to the end. Our destiny is set by Heaven, and Heaven alone can accomplish it. What news from the north?"

Gourko's voice trembled slightly as he replied:

"St. Petersburg is surrounded, sire. But that alone I would not fear. Danger from without may be met with ease. But——"

"You hesitate! What is it you suspect?"

"This, your majesty. That the city itself may rise. There is disaffection through every rank. Should it have spread to the garrison we must be prepared for bad news indeed."

"And the south?"

"That," replied Gourko, "is for the present not to be counted on. The Nihilists have swarmed over every province, and the Black Sea is no longer in our hands."

"In that case," exclaimed the Tsar, with defiant pride, "we must depend upon ourselves. My forefathers had dangers like these to face, and in the hour of peril proved themselves kings. You will not find me unworthy of them, General. Let us ride on to the Palace. We will prepare a blow that will chill the very heart of rebellion and secure for ever the dominion of my race!"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

GRAND FINE ART DISTRIBUTION

OF

GENUINE STEEL PLATE ENGRAVINGS

TO THE READERS OF

"SHORT STORIES."

"BOLTON ABBEY IN THE OLDEN TIME."

On Plate Paper, measuring 27 by 20 inches.

After the Original Painting by SIR EDWIN LANDSEER, R.A.

The above high-class guaranteed Genuine Steel Plate Engravings, produced entirely by hand direct from the Original Plate, and published in a larger size in India Proof style at Eight Guineas per Copy, are now secured to the Readers of "Short Stories" at 3/- each, or with the pair of Steel Plate Engravings, "A Sure Find," and "Escaped!" after Richard Ansdell, R.A. ("Bolton Abbey" being the centre-piece), for 7/6 the set of three pictures, securely packed and carriage paid. Readers preferring India Prints can secure the three engravings produced on India Paper and mounted on Plate Paper, at double the above prices.

Remittances should be sent to the South Kensington Fine Art Association Ltd., 7 Exhibition Road, South Kensington, London, S.W., who undertake to forward the Pictures, carriage paid, to any part of the world (Foreign and Colonial, 2/- extra), securely packed in stout case, so that they will arrive in good condition.

IN WRITING TO THE ASSOCIATION, "SHORT STORIES" SHOULD BE MENTIONED, and on the top left-hand corner of the Envelope the following number should be quoted: "No. 8."

The general distribution of the set of twelve magnificent STEEL PLATE ENGRAVINGS and PRINTS (Series "U") recently effected (copies of which can still be had for One Guinea the set of twelve), has given the greatest satisfaction, and letters of thanks have been received from all parts of the world, from many who have long desired such High-class Works of Art for the adornment of their homes at a merely nominal figure, but who have been hitherto unable to acquire them by reason of the prohibitive prices usually charged for the same.

N.B.—As the number of Copies is limited, it is desirable to make early application. A certain portion of the issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial Readers of Short Stories

Digitized by Google

CONSULTATIONS FREE.

Puzzled writes to say that he has never yet come across a newspaper labelled "first edition," however early in the day he procures the evening paper. "How is it?"——Because there is no "first"; it begins at the second. This is the result of keen competition between rival publishers. In the same way, many papers advance from the second edition to the fourth.

R. T. B.—It is correct to call or leave cards after a dance to which you have been invited, whether you accepted the invitation or not.

J. T.—About the most rapacious appetite I know of was that possessed by a hog in Scio, Oregon. Its owner often said that it seemed to eat its own bulk of food at each meal. When the hog was killed the other day it was found to possess two perfect stomachs and two complete sets of intestines. No wonder it had such an appetite.

D. S.—In modern history, Leipsic holds the record as the battle in which the greatest number of lives were lost. In that protracted fight, which took place in October, 1813, 80,000 men perished. It was originally stated that in the two great attacks on Plevna, the Russians and their allies lost 46,000 men; but the number is now set down as 30,000.

W. A. H.—Strictly speaking, a creole is one born of European parents in the West Indies, though now the term is frequently used in the Colonies to designate anything West Indian, Negro and English.

C. H. G. writes: "Can you tell me why the figure of a cock is so often to be seen upon the top of a church steeple?"——The cock used to be placed on the top of sacred trees before it was transferred to buildings to disperse, by its gyrations and loud crowing, evil spirits and all the train of approaching calamity.

W.—The air we breathe wants washing occasionally. After a good rainfall the impurities are less in number, and the pleasure with which we take the air into our lungs when we go out after the rain shows that our organism appreciates the result of the washing.

F. N.—In Canton they name streets after the virtues, as we name them after prominent people. In some instances these names do not appear strange to us; Love Street, for instance, does not excite our astonishment. Pure Pearl Street is getting a little beyond us, but Benevolence Street and Unblemished Rectitude Street, especially the latter, go a little too far for our present notions. Perhaps we shall progress after the Tsar's Peace Conference.

Liverpool Juggins.—If a train, moving at the speed of twenty-five miles an hour, were suddenly stopped, the passengers would experience a shock equal to that of falling from a second floor window; at thirty miles an hour, he might as well fall from a height of three flights of stairs: and an express train's sudden stoppage would be like a fall from a fourth storey.

F. D.—The death-plant of Java is thus named on account of the strength of the perfume given off by its flowers. It kills all forms of insect life that come under its influence, and if inhaled for a few minutes by a human being, will overcome and kill him.

H. T.—Although working men are commonly called "Proletarians," strictly speaking, they are nothing of the sort. When King Servius Tullius reorganised the Roman State, he restricted the franchise to men whose property amounted to over £40 of our money and called all who had less, and whose only value to the state consisted in the possibility of becoming fathers to children, a "proletarius" from proles a progeny. As the proletarians did not vote, they were not called upon to pay taxes; hence, with this comparison, it is absurd to call "working men" by such a title.

M.—The laws of the United States contain no provision for the notification to the President-Elect that he has been elected. The votes are counted and the result inscribed in the journals of both Houses of Congress, but the successful candidate for the Presidency has to find out the result for himself. There is no trouble about that, of course, but it is strange that there should be such an omission.

R. J. would like to know during what part of the year dogs are most liable to suffer from rabies.——The majority of cases occur in the wettest months. In April, November, and December the recorded cases are double and triple those in June, July and August.

G. G.—Chinese rice paper is made from thin slices of the pith from the cane of a tree about five feet high. A sharp knife pares the pith into cylinders of uniform thickness, which are then unrolled and pressed out into so-called "rice" paper.

B.—The name "blanket" was first given to the fabric of which those comforting articles were made because it was produced by three brothers named Blanket. They were eminent woollen weavers who lived in Bristol in the reign of Edward III.

G. L.—The obituary list of 1893 contained more titles than that of any recent year. Including Baronets, Knights, and Companions (of various orders), it covered 158 titled personages.

Dulwich writes: "A friend of mine insists that the Crystal Palace does not stand in Sydenham. Surely such a statement is ridiculous on the face of it!"——Not at all. The district of Sydenham is entirely in Kent, while the Palace site is in Surrey, near Upper Norwood, the greater part of which is in Lambeth parish.

D. L. P.—The common tortoise sold in the streets for killing black beetles will do nothing of the kind. It exclusively lives on leaves and fruit. Some water tortoises are, however, carnivorous.

Y.—The day set apart for public worship varies with the religion of the worshippers. Christians observe Sunday; with the Greeks it is Monday; the Persians have Tuesday the Assyrians have public worship on Wednesday; the Egyptians on Thursday; the Turks on Friday and the Jewish Sabbath is Saturday.

S.—The wild tribes of the Caucasus teach their children the use of the dagger as soon as the little ones can walk about and hold the weapon. The first task is to stab water without making a splash, not so easy of accomplishment by a child as we might suppose.

F.—One of the largest forests in the world is situated between Ural and the Okhotsk Sea, and may be said to be growing on ice. The authorities had a well dug in that region recently, and it was found that at a depth of 340 feet the ground was still frozen.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Jan. 3rd, if intended for the Issue on sale Jan. 17th, and dated Jan. 21st. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE SALTER

£8 8s. IMPROVED No 5 CASE 10/6

WHAT TO DO WITH YOUR DAUGHTERS.

BUY THEM A

"SALTER,"

ENGLISH Made, with Latest Improvements. Does as good work as one at 20 Guineas, and guaranteed for 12 months. When learnt they can soon earn a comfortable living. Lessons free. Arrangements made for Easy Payments. It has Good Alignment, Visible Writing, Light Touch, Universal Keyboard, and is the Best Manifolder and Stenciller on the Market.

Offices: 7 NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; ¼lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d., including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS
MORCHARD BISHOP,
DEVON.

KEATINGS LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENCES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

SUITABLE GIFT BOOKS

PIRATE GOLD. By J. R. HUTCHINSON, Author of "Romance of a Regiment," "Quest of the Golden Pearl," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 8 illustrations by Ernest Smythe, price 5s.

"A real good old tale of adventure. . . . There is plenty of incident and life in the book."—BELFAST NORTHERN WHIG.

THE GREAT HOUSE OF CASTLETON. By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 3s. 6d.

LITTLE MISS ROBINSON CRUSOE. By MRS. GEORGE CORBETT, Author of the "Adventures of an Only Girl," "The Young Stowaway," etc. With Illustrations by A. Kemp Tebby. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

PRINCE UNO: Uncle Frank's Visit to Fairyland. Illustrated by W. D. Stevens. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, price 3s. 6d.

"We feel sure this pleasant fairy story, very well and embellished as it has been by excellent illustrations, will amuse little folk as much as it will touch and interest their elders."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

London: C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Her Majesty's Perruquier

and Lillie Powder.

"As a preparation for the skin LILLIE POWDER is unequalled owing to its medicinal qualities. It cannot be too highly recommended to Gentlemen after shaving, or for the Gentlewoman's Toilet Table, and is invaluable for all blemishes of the skin. The majority of much advertised toilet powders are most injurious to the complexion. Mixed in large quantities the ingredients are often prepared in wrong proportions. LILLIE POWDER is prepared under my strict personal supervision, and I hereby guarantee that each box is dispensed according to the original recipe. (Signed) WILLIAM CLARKSON."

Mrs. Langtry, so renowned for her glorious complexion, has for many years used and recommended the LILLIE POWDER privately to her friends, as being made from her original recipe. We are pleased to say that we have induced Mrs. Langtry to allow us to prepare the LILLIE POWDER in large quantities, in order to cope with the demand which we are confident the public will put upon it. It is absolutely the finest preparation for the complexion, owing to its MEDICINAL QUALITIES.

PREPARED FROM THE ORIGINAL RECIPE INVENTED BY Mrs. LANGTRY

THREE TINTS: Blanche, Naturelle, and Rachel. EXQUISITELY PERFUMED. To be had of all the Best Chemists and Hairdressers.

Price ONE SHILLING. BY POST, 1s. 2d.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE, 3 HENRIETTA STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"MATCHLESS"

WARNING TO LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY. Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. If it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT.

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

METAL POLISH.

PATON, CALVERT & Co. MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL.

"SEN-SEN"

THROAT-EASE AND BREATH PERFUME.

INVALUABLE TO SINGERS & SPEAKERS.

Sold Everywhere 3p per packet

Good for YOUNG & OLD.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

NUTRITIOUS, EASILY DIGESTED, OF DELICIOUS FLAVOUR & AROMA.

PURE SOLUBLE COCOA

GUARANTEED TO BE THE PRODUCT OF THE FINEST COCOA BEANS.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP.

LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

IT IS NOT Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

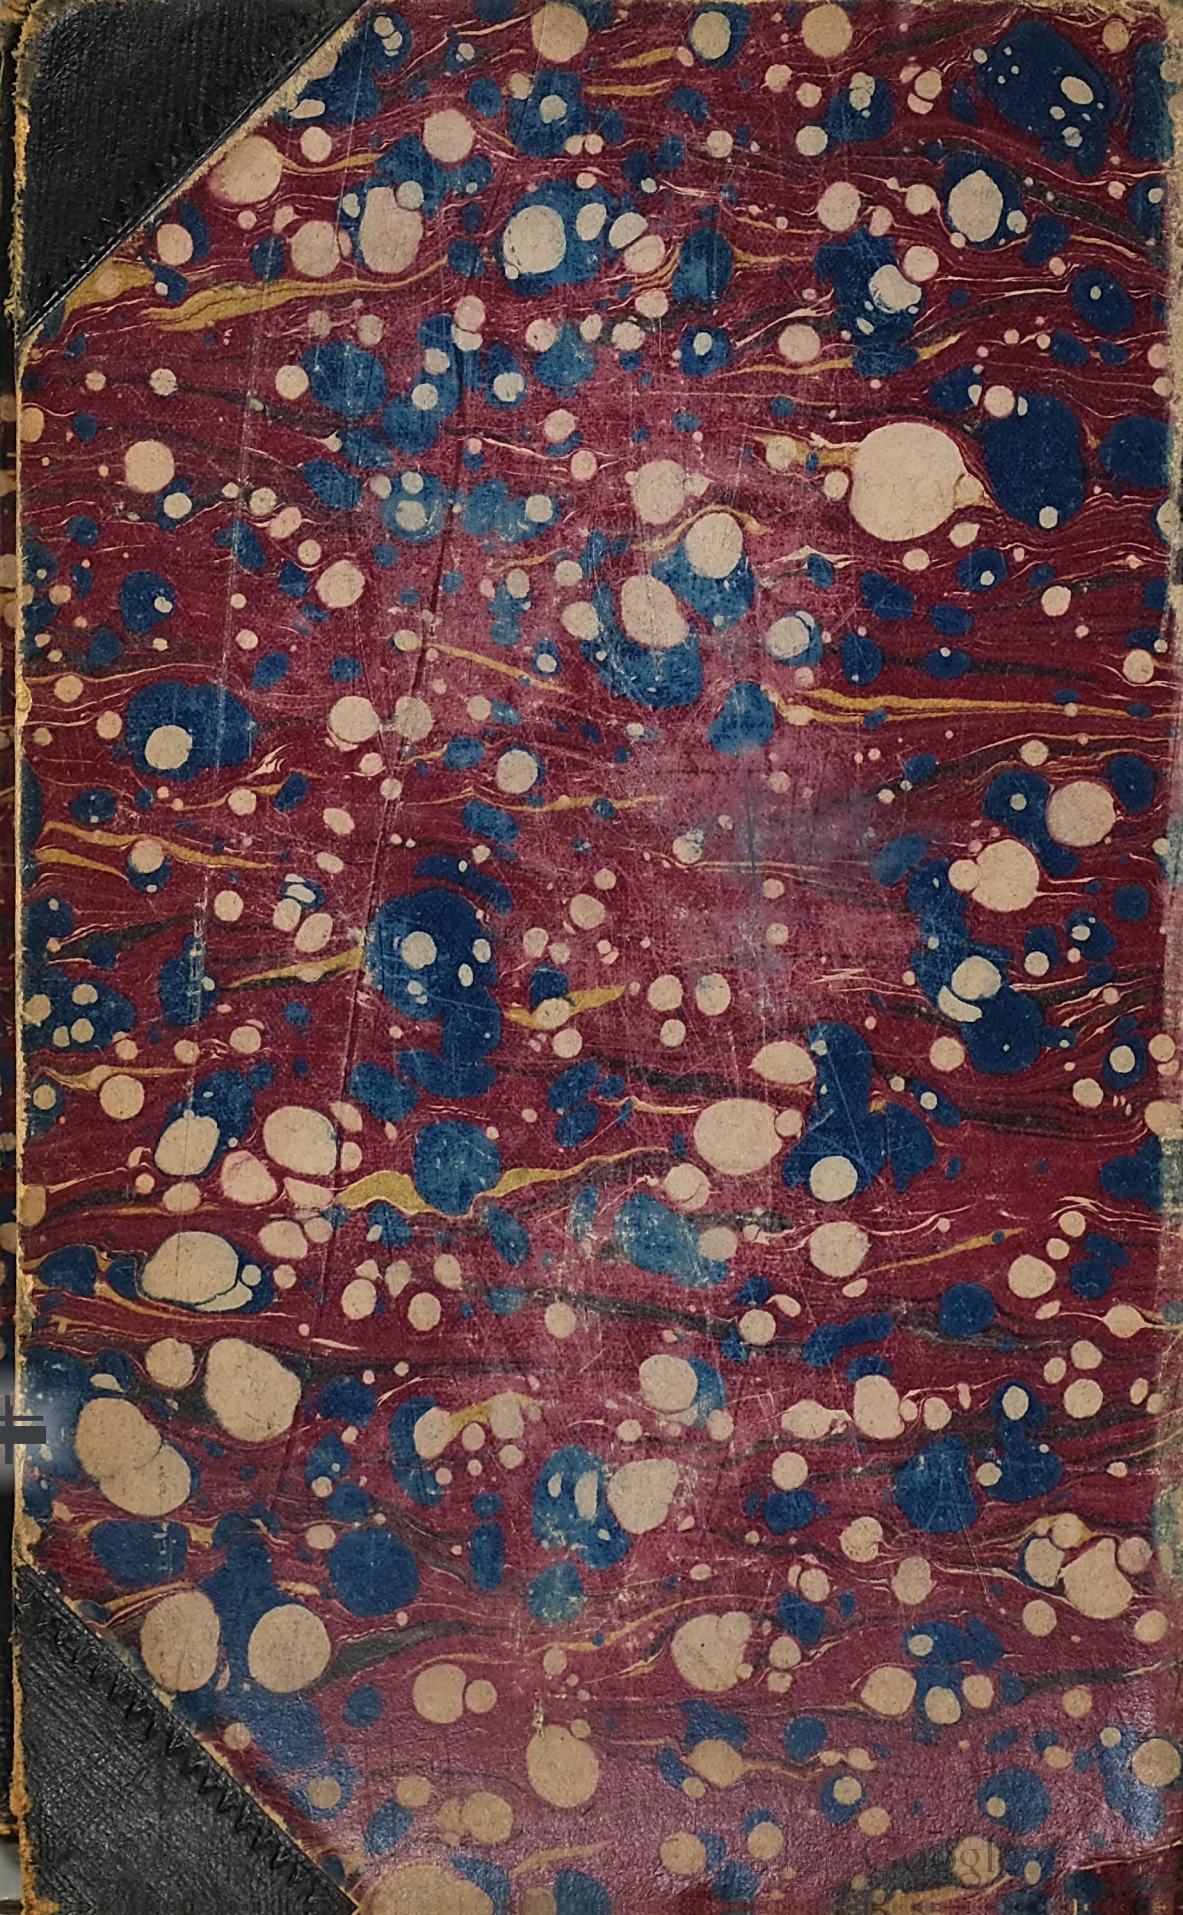
UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google


Digitized by Google